The lawyer had taken leave immediately the last struggle was over; but in parting from Esther, I saw again that same defiant glance flash from face to face. The scream that startled me had not come from Esther; one glance at her cold, pale face assured me of that. She was moving about the room, apparently trying to give it some appearance of order before the arrival of relatives or friends; while Lisbia, the slave woman, now crouching by the side of her dead mistress, gave vent to bitter and passionate moans. I confess I was surprised and mystified. I would rather have seen some demonstration of affliction, under circumstances so sad and solemn; but this marble coldness, this seeming indifference, the looks of defiance and mockery which I had detected! There was evidently a secret between herself and the lawyer which no one else was expected to share, and this secret I began to fear had paralyzed her heart.

While I was still watching her movements, the curtains parted, and stepping from the balcony into the room came one of the most beautiful children the world ever saw. She was springing towards the bed, when Esther caught her hand and held her back. Lisbia had also started forward to detain her; but meeting the eye of Esther, she slunk away into the shadows and so out of the room. Here was another enigma. Lisbia had been the nurse mother of Esther, loved by her as only children of the South know how to love their nurses, beloved in return with a passion amounting almost to idolatry.

Perhaps my readers have a right to know something more of the family into which I have so unceremoniously introduced them. Henry Lascelle for many years was considered the richest planter in New Orleans. At an early age, he married a woman some years his senior, with whom, if he did not live happily, at least the world were none the wiser for it.

Esther and Oriana were not the only children whose piping cry had been heard in the Lascelle mansion. First came Esther, a weak, puny child, whom no one thought they could ever raise. Henry Lascelle was disappointed; he wanted an heir to his estate. As her husband wished, so wished his wife; his will to her was law and gospel. So Esther was allowed to pine away and die, or come up among the hundreds of negro children which infested the plantation, as fate might decree. This carelessness for her welfare probably saved her life. Lisbia took her home to her mother's cabin, and from that time forth was her exclusive attendant.

A couple of years more, and the long-coveted treasure was laid in his father's arms—there was an heir to "Lakeleath" at last. But such an heir! With so small a lease of life!—scarcely the measure of a day! Henry Lascelle's life was never the same to him after his great disappointment. "Lakeleath," the family mansion, was neglected and suffered to go to ruin. Some said he gambled recklessly; that he drank to excess. The nightly orgies held at his house, no less than the bloated, heated countenance he wore, were proof positive. Whatever suffering his wife must have endured, she never complained. She had married him for love; and not even the physical debasement she was nightly witness of, had power to check its intensity.

At the age of fifteen, Esther scarcely knew she had a father—or, indeed, a mother beyond the poor slave girl who waited upon her so devoutedly. Her education was rigorously attended to. She had the advantage of the best of teachers and the best of schools. Lisbia was her constant attendant, and for a wonder was allowed to sit under the droppings of the same wisdom which was to form the mind of her young mistress. Being a smart, shrewd girl, she did not allow this advantage to escape her. She made the most of the few crumbs which fell to her share; so that when Esther's education terminated, she returned to her home with a waiting-maid nearly as accomplished, certainly as lady-like in appearance as herself. At this period, Esther was fifteen and Lisbia twenty-five; yet judging from their faces, their ages might have been reversed—Esther being, from the circumstances of her childhood, grave, stately, and quite too womanly for her years, while Lisbia was just her reverse in every way. If there was one thing more than another on earth, that Esther prided herself upon at that period, it was the beauty of her maid. It was more than beauty—a something that, meeting the eye, was hard to baffle from the heart. Her bright, creamy complexion, her great oriental eyes, her massive midnight hair, which hung in waves upon a pair of shoulders most superbly rounded by nature's great architect—you could not forget her, no more than you could forget Powers's "Eve," or Raphael's "Madonna." That she should have been a slave! Why, there was scarcely a woman she encountered, whose complexion could compare with hers for purity!

I have said that Esther and her beautiful waiting-maid had come home to Lakeleath for good. About this time, a most astonishing change was visible in the career of Henry Lascelle. He began to take a deep interest in his daughter, to overlook her studies, plan pleasant excursions for her, always to be attended by Lisbia, and try, in various ways, to make up for the negligence of her youth. Like father, like mother! The pale, careless woman, from whom Esther had shrunk abashed, now overloaded her with caresses. There was nothing too good for her. Parties were made to bring her out in style, the most costly dresses and jewelry were purchased to enhance the not over-brilliant beauty of her person, and it grew to be an understood thing that she was the acknowledged heiress of Lakeleath and its surroundings.

Nearly a year had passed in this manner, when to the surprise of the circle in which they revolved, another child was born to the house of the Lascelles. Of course this unheard-of wonder brought out all their callers, far and near; but Mrs. Lascelle was too ill to be seen. The child of their old age, a healthy, hearty girl, was duly admired and petted. Esther was in raptures—the more so, that her maid Lisbia had been visiting on a neighboring plantation for a couple of months, and she had felt lonely; but anxious as she was to be perpetually in attendance upon the little stranger, her mother was too ill to admit even her. A compromise was effected, however, and she was allowed to take her sister to her own room, where she could pet and love and kiss it to her heart's content. It would be difficult to say which was most enamored of its infant sweetness, her father or herself. As for Lascelle, he would sit for hours by its lace-lined crib, tracing out every feature in the beautiful face, folding the tiny hands in his big palm, or, sillier than all, trying to count the little blue veins which seemed bursting through the skin, so white and pure as it was. In a few weeks, however, his amusements were somewhat curtailed. Lisbia returned, Mrs. Lascelle was able to leave her room, and the old routine of life re-commenced where it had been thus broken.

I am taking too much time over this portion of the lives of Esther and Oriana Lascelle. Suffice it that their father did not live long to enjoy the society of the pet of his old age. A fall from a horse, from which he never recovered, kept him many months a prisoner, from which imprisonment he was released only by death.

It was some years after this, that I became acquainted with the family. Then the sweet gravity of Esther, the delicacy and womanly reserve of her manner, the beauty and purity of her life, so enchanted me, that I asked permission to continue my visits. Need I tell you how, step by step, our hearts ran out to meet each other? how soon I learned that beneath that calm, pure bosom there burned a flame, strong and passionate as it was pure? how the knowledge came to me, at first slowly and scarcely to be recognized, that with all the power, with all the strength and might of my manhood's heart, I loved Esther Lascelle, and that even as I loved her, even so did she love me? She did not hesitate to tell me; she did not practise upon me any of the airs and coquetries which so perplex men and degrade women. She merely laid her soft little hand in mine, saying:

"I have loved you always—always, it seems to me. I am so glad no one ever even asked me to love them. I should have felt degraded; as if I had wronged you. I always pity women who have had lovers, and who have loved before the right one came. I think one ought to be very certain that one really loves, before giving a man encouragement. Don't you?"

The question was so sincere, and so earnestly asked, that but for the truth and simple purity which beamed from her questioning eyes, I should have felt inclined to laugh.

Her mother offered no objection to our betrothal. Her affections, never very strong, waned greatly after her husband's death, or seemed rather to centre entirely on Oriana. You will not be surprised, then, that knowing Esther as I did, my perplexity nearly overshadowed my affection, in view of the calm, almost heartless manner in which she superintended her mother's deathbed. She refused me an interview that night, although she was well aware that the morrow's sunset would find me "on the deep, deep sea," in quest of knowledge and happiness on another continent.

I would willingly have deferred my voyage, if I could have prevailed on her to be my companion. I was to take the tour of Europe. I was to visit the mighty ruins of Rome, to stand where sacred feet had pressed the sod, and to worship amid the relics of the sublime and holy past, against which no man can quite shut the door of his heart. I knew how greatly the pleasure of this visit would be enhanced by her society. But her mother was ill, perhaps would never recover; she should never forgive herself, if she were to accede to my wishes and her mother were to die during her absence.

I said no more; but when the worst was over, when her mother was dead, it seemed hard indeed that I should be refused an interview, especially when I knew that favor had not been denied her detested lawyer.

Later in the evening, I saw her walking in the garden—if walking it could be called, which was a fierce tramp up and down, up and down, crushing alike with remorseless cruelty dewy blossoms or tender buds. I could almost distinguish the different perfumes, as they drifted up on the light breeze. I know that among them, heliotrope was the most conspicuous; and it was many years before I could govern myself sufficiently to tolerate that perfume without the same sad and sickening sensation which overcame me on that sorrowful evening. She must have kept up her march for more than half an hour—it seemed an age to me—when she stopped suddenly and looked up through the leafy shadows to my window.

"May I come?" I whispered, in a voice which could only reach her ear.

"For a moment—yes!"

Her voice was tremulous, and I saw by the moonlight that her eyes were glittering with tears. Sooner than I can write it, I was by her side, with my arms about her waist. Then her grief gave full vent. I let her weep until the fountain had exhausted itself.

"Esther! Esther! what is it?" I pleaded.

She started from my arms, a strong shudder seizing upon every nerve.

"I dare not! I dare not! O, if I only could! Why must the sins of the guilty be visited upon the innocent? What had I done, that my life should be darkened by this dreadful—"

She did not finish the sentence, but the hand which I had regained grasped mine with a frenzy that was almost painful.

"Has that wretch of a lawyer any claim upon you? Only tell me so far—"

"Claim? N—n-o! Don't question me, if you love me. I cannot tell you part, without the whole—and God help me! I dare not break my oath!"

She sank upon a garden chair, and seemed trying to collect herself.

"Yes—I would say this, before I go. If anything should happen, if you should never see me again, remember you are almost the first man I ever knew—certainly the first who ever interested himself in my favor. It would be an insult to ask if you love me, to say that I love you. I know there is peril, temptation, perhaps crime in the distance; it may be far away, or it may be near my own door. I know it will come—a wild, sad trouble, against which there will be no resistance; against which I may beat my helpless wings till every pinion lies soiled and broken, yet with no avail."

"And you think I will leave you to bear it alone? I will not go—"

"You must—you must"—all her calmness suddenly returning. "It is not now, not for years to come, that I have anything to fear. Believe me, it is best, wisest, safest."

I do not know what arguments I used, what prayers I urged. I would not be denied. I had the right to protect her, and be the dark shadow what it might, I would stay to penetrate it. She let me rave on, pouring the most passionate protestations into her ear; but when I turned from her ear to her eye, I knew it was useless. Esther was determined! We thought it best to make that scene our last parting. There was nothing stirring in its excess, however deeply our hearts were wrung. Hand in hand we wandered past the garden down to a pond whose bosom was white with water lilies, and where we had often walked when the evenings were bright as now. There seemed to be a fresh sparkle in every lily, an Undine in every cup. The air was heavy with their fragrance—the soft, sweet, peaceful air, which fell so gently on our heated brows. There were but few words said, on either side. I took her in my arms, kissed her again and again, and then put her from me.

I watched her firm tread, as she passed on, over the green lawn and on through the garden, home. At the door, I saw her little white hand waving me a kiss; then the door opened, then closed again, and there was no more fluttering figure, no more dainty hands, no more loving, trusting, tender face—nothing but a blank darkness between me and my manhood's idol. Need I blush to own that then and there, on the very spot her feet had made sacred, I knelt and wept such burning tears of bitter sorrow as only the most poignant grief can wring from the bosom of hardy manhood?

I went to Europe, but my soul was sick and unsatisfied. If I could only know my enemy! but even that relief was denied me. And so, for two years, I wandered alone, oftentimes on foot, and was at least in mind the veriest Pariah the earth contained.

For eighteen months, Esther's letters were frequent and tender. Much she had to say of the rare and wondrous beauty of her young sister, Oriana, begging of me to steel my heart against her triumphant charms, that she might have no occasion to regret the blooming in her garden of this most gorgeous flower.

"She is a perfect enchantress," one of her letters said; "to resist her is impossible, as many a man has found to his cost. But, thank God, up to this day, which completes her seventeenth year, her own heart has remained free!" And again, in a later one: "Do you know a Judge Gordon? A West Indian, I believe, but so magnificent! He is wondrously attentive to Oriana, and I begin to fear she is rather inclining towards him. If it should be—"

And why did she fear? Know Judge Gordon, one of the best and noblest of men? Of course I did; and so I wrote her—and wrote her, too, that if she was looking for a large-brained, large-hearted, brilliant, eloquent and most honorable man for her sister's husband, nowhere on the earth could she find an equal for Judge Gordon! Long before she could have received this last letter of mine, I had another from her. Such a letter as it was! not in quantity, but in quality. You would have thought that all the rage, the grief, the madness of her heart, had converged itself through her pen to her paper.

"It has fallen!" she wrote. "The cloud has fallen! The heartless, the contemptible, the cowardly villain, warring against two weak women! ~~My~~ ^{My} Grange has set his beastly eyes upon my sister—my beautiful Oriana! I was mistaken in my forebodings. I knew his craven soul was determined upon a victim, but I thought it would have been the heiress, not the beauty! I was prepared to fight my own battle, but not the fiercer one of Oriana. But I will foil him! be sure of that. He shall not desecrate the pure shrine of that beautiful bosom." Again: "Oriana loves Judge Gordon! I have made sure of that. O, how my brain throbs! how my soul sickens! But do not fear for me! It is not Lawyer Grange who will conquer me. Oriana is growing paler and thinner, day by day. She sees there is something mysterious going on about her. She thinks me harsh and cruel, that I do not meet her lover with open hands. And so I am cruel! and so I despise myself that I dare not do so!"

I did not wait even to answer the letter, but hastily packing my trunks, I took the first steamer for America, determined, if there was any fighting to be done, Esther should not be without an aid. I found them at Lakeleath, under the management and supervision of Lawyer Grange, who, as manager of the estate and as guardian of Oriana until she should come of age, had taken the liberty of making it his permanent residence. At the first encounter between himself and me, although scarcely lasting the sixtieth part of a minute, there was proclaimed war to the knife. If Vesuvius had taken an aerial flight, settling itself down for a quiet smoke on the Lakeleath grounds, he could not have been more unwelcomely astonished than when his little gray eyes first became aware of my presence. Esther was in the garden, reading some book under shelter of a vast prairie rose which ever and anon mingled its beautiful blossoms with the braids of her rich brown hair.

"I knew you were coming," she said, after the first greeting was over.

"How could you have known it?" I queried. "I never even wrote."

"But I knew it all the same. My presentiments are seldom incorrect."

"Only when they lead you to fancy Lawyer Grange has a design upon you."

"Not upon me—upon my fortune! But, Maurice, it is ten times worse as the case stands now."

A garland of roses and lilies strung together by bits of honeysuckle and grape vine was suddenly flung over both our heads, while a roguish dimpled face beamed in between us, and looked straight into my eyes. A little scream, a hurried exclamation, and a deal of confusion was the consequence, in the midst of which there came an apology in the sweetest tones I ever heard.

"I beg ten thousand pardons—I thought it was James you were taking such liberties with, and I did it just for a lark."

"My sister Oriana, Mr. Stark." We had risen from our seats and turned toward the blushing truant.

Beautiful! I think for a moment my very heart stood still in homage to such illustrious and overpowering beauty. Scarcely up to the medium height of womanhood, yet with every outline of her willowy form marked with nature's most brilliant handiwork, it was impossible not to count her perfection. I could not, if I would, describe her face. I had seen the luscious demoiselle of France, the dreaming-eyed Georgian, the voluptuous Italian, the fresh and hearty English woman, and the delicate American, but among them all I could find no comparison for Oriana. In vain I tried to trace the smallest likeness to Esther—it was not there. That rich, dark complexion, those large, almond-shaped eyes, the long, massive curls, crimped clear up to the broad, pure temples; I had seen something somewhere (in a dream it must have been) like, yet unlike to this most gorgeous specimen of oriental loveliness; but it was not on the face of my betrothed. Forgive me, my beloved, if for a brief and passing moment, I almost, ay, quite wished it might have been there; but alas! Esther, with the shadow of twenty-eight years on her brow, made poor show beside her fresh, youthful sister. Do not think I would have made an exchange even for the space of a moment. If time had taken the freshness from Esther's brow, it had left there something far more endearing, far more enduring—a tender, gentle, loving trust which no circumstance, no chance of circumstances could ever obliterate.

Oriana's embarrassment was of short duration. There was evidently something very funny upon her mind, for the dimples kept coming and going upon her cheeks, and occasionally a single little gleeful laugh would ring out and far away upon the wings of the wind.

"What is it, pet?" said Esther, toying with one of the long curls which had drifted into her face.

"Something so funny. Who do you think has proposed to me?"

Esther turned pale as a lily, but kept her face from Oriana.

"Who, dear?"

"Old Grange, of all persons in the world." And a merry, pealing laugh woke the echoes for a mile in circle.

"And you?" Esther's voice was slightly tremulous, and I could see the old-time shiver creeping over all her frame. "What did you do?"

"Do! What should I do? What would you have done? What would you have had me do? I laughed in his face—asked after his pet corn and his 'rheumatiz'—told him when the world had got so run out of men as to be under the necessity of calling him one, then I might perhaps listen to his suite."

"O, rash girl—rash girl! O, Heaven help us now—he never will forgive us."

"Forgive us! I think the shoe is on the other foot. I think it is me who should be expected to forgive him. The impertinence of the thing."

"But you do not know—you cannot conceive—"

At that moment Lisbia came to the garden to announce the arrival of Judge Gordon. Oriana was off like a shot, while Lisbia lingered to gain some directions from Esther relative to household arrangements. It flashed over me in a moment. That creamy clearness of complexion; those singularly fascinating and beautiful eyes! Had I Esther's secret at last? I dared not ask. If so, and she had taken an oath to keep it, I knew she would be torn to pieces by wild beasts before she would reveal it even to me. I determined, however, to keep my eyes open; and if needs be, to caution my friend, Judge Gordon, to be on the alert. This was probably the hold Lawyer Grange had upon the susceptible mind of Esther. She had a great horror of shame and sin, come in whatsoever form it might. Pure herself, she had judged others by the instincts of her own sweet life. There had been a deeper, perhaps more charitable judgment in her heart for the errors of poor humanity since the fatal evening of her mother's death.

Yes—I saw it all now—Lawyer Grange had, as solicitor for her mother, become aware of a disgraceful secret which threatened her honored father's memory. Had she been a lawyer like myself, she would have known that at least in the frame of Oriana the trace of negro blood was so far extinct, that the most venomous of petifoggers would fail to make out a case against her.

That evening, I joined and walked home with Judge Gordon. He was in the very poorest of spirits. The judge was a handsome man, not far from thirty, and I confess it sometimes puzzled me to account for his passionate attachment to the wild and spirited creole.

"I do not understand it," he said to me, as we were on our way into town. "I love Oriana with all the might and mind of a man who has loved for the first time in his life, and she loves me; but, impetuous, passionate, wildly worshipful as she is when we are alone, the moment her sister enters the room, the change becomes appalling. The beating, burning heart seems suddenly turned to marble; the fond, loving face assumes an expression of the most stolid indifference; the tender, worshipful tones grow harsh and unmusical. If it was only for the deception of the thing, I should feel annoyed. Such good acting in one so young, is fearful; and yet I love—I love her! I cannot tear my heart from its allegiance—I cannot bid the waves of passion ‘peace’—I cannot say to my heart’s great craving, ‘thus far shalt thou go, and no farther.’ When she is her own, blithe, brave, true, happy little self, there is not that treasure in the world I would change her for. But—”

“I see—I see. Now let me ask you a question or two. If by chance some tale of wrong or shame, not committed by herself, herself in no way responsible for it, yet at the same time, a tale compromising her name in the eyes of the world, should meet your ears, do you love her well enough to take her to the home of your heart as the wife of your bosom, the mother of your children?”

“Stay; let me understand you. A tale compromising her name, a crime of which she is innocent, a shame of which she is ignorant? You speak in riddles.”

“If you knew she was good and pure, and innocent, that she was all a man might wish for in a wife, and that only for this taint—”

The judge laid his hand heavily on my arm. “The sins of the father shall be visited upon his children,” he said, in a most solemn and impressive voice. “I have feared this before.”

I saw he had understood my meaning, and launched at once into the very heart of the story. I knew Mrs. Lascelle well enough to know that there was no sacrifice on earth that she would not have made to save her husband’s honor, and so I told him. This, with the singular circumstances attending her deathbed, confirmed me in my suspicion.

“But what is to be done? That scheming lawyer has evidently determined to make the most of this knowledge, and Esther as evidently believes Oriana to be irretrievably in his power.”

“Let us watch our chance, and by the by, it is early yet—scarcely nine o’clock. I have an idea there will be trouble at Lakeleath to-night. We can but retrace our steps, and be on hand in case of need.”

At the family mansion, there was a long, low room on the ground floor, used as the sitting-room for its occupants. Old-fashioned windows, reaching to the ground, and opening in the centre like folding doors, gave usual ingress and egress to the family. In the summer time these windows were curtained only by vines of climbing roses which grew in great profusion in that locality. Among these vines, Judge Gordon and myself took our station, looking through its leafy curtains into the room beyond. And such a sight as met our eyes; Esther was standing in the centre of the room, calm, pale, with a set determination upon her face that I had never seen there before. At her side, half crouching, half kneeling, with both arms wound firmly about her sister, with her great dark eyes, wild with fright, with her long hair torn and dishevelled, Oriana appeared, looking the very image of terror and despair. Her eyes were fixed on Lawyer Grange, who stood with folded arms against the door as if barring all egress. The burning glances of Lisbia wandered first to him with indignation and rage, then to the trembling and affrighted girl who clung almost with a death-clasp to her sister. Judge Gordon made one spring, and would have dashed in through the window if my strong arm had not detained him. It was not my purpose to appear until I had made myself acquainted with the circumstances of the case. If anything in the world could have appalled a man, it would have been the indignant, burning glances of those three injured women; but no muscle of his face was disturbed.

“You think you have foiled me,” he hissed out between lips white with passion. “You think I shall never dare a second attempt. No more shall I; I thought to carry her off by force, as making the least scandal. Let the scandal come now; you have brought it on your own head. The girl is mine. You know she is mine. No law on earth can keep her from me. Do you comprehend it, girl? You are mine, my property, my—”

“Silence, villain! This insult is between yourself and me. Do not dare breathe another word in the hearing of my sister.”

Oriana was gazing from one to the other with eyes distended in dread and horror.

“And why not? She has got to know it sooner or later. I may not be so young or so handsome as Judge Gordon; but I shall make her just as good a husband, or master—it rests with her to say which. Come, now, no more squeamishness—I offered you honorable love, you returned me hate and scorn.” He was advancing toward Oriana, but there was something in the eye of Esther that checked him. "Very well, very well, all this has got to be paid for. That lovely face will make quite a show on a plantation of field niggers; those beautiful limbs give a new grace to the whipping—"

The words were not out of his mouth before he found himself whizzing away to another part of the room rather more expeditiously than it was agreeable. Oriana bounded into her lover's arms, and lay there, peaceful and at rest. Poor girl! she thought at least there was shelter and protection on his broad breast.

"All to be paid for; all to be paid for. All your love, all your money can't save her. She is mine. Look here, and here," he screamed in demoniac rage, producing from a dirty and begrimed wallet, two large and formidable looking law papers.

Esther paid no attention to his claims. She merely asked Judge Gordon to take her sister from the room, and return alone. Her voice was as calm, her face as determined as on that long ago night of her mother's death. When the judge returned, she requested him to hand her the papers, which the lawyer was still waving triumphantly above his head.

"Ay, you find it all right—signed, sealed, and to be delivered when called for."

Esther read the paper as calmly as if it had been any ordinary document.

"It is a forgery," she said, after a moment's pause. "That is not my father's signature."

Lawyer Grange went white to his very lips. "Prove it, prove it!" he almost screamed.

"I will," Esther went to a secretary standing in a corner of the room, and took therefrom a small iron-bound box.

From this box she selected a couple of papers bearing resemblance to those held by the lawyer. These she handed to Judge Gordon, telling him he would understand their purport. The first was a paper, filled out in form, by which Lisbia was made free for life. The second, a most carefully worded one, went on to explain that Oriana Lascelle, though the child of Lisbia, was free according to law; but fearing that in the future some accident might happen whereby her liberty would be curtailed, he had made this provision against the possibility of accident. Lucky that he had done so.

"This then was your secret?" I said to Esther, as she refolded the papers.

"It was my mother's secret. Her whole heart and soul seemed set upon its being kept inviolate. I think she would not have died in peace had I not taken an oath never to reveal the birth of Oriana to mortal man. Lawyer Grango had prepared her will, and in that manner, became possessed of her secret. My poor sister, it will break her heart to know of this taint in her blood, slight as it is."

"Why need she know it?" It was Judge Gordon who spoke, his noble face flushing with the triumph of a good action.

"Surely, surely, you will not think of marrying her now?"

"Am I a man? Do you think I will visit on her innocent head the sins of others? But where is that wretch of a lawyer?"

Where indeed? In the excitement of the moment he had slunk away, and it was many months before he ever ventured again near Lakeleath. Poor Lisbia was almost wild with joy; and Oriana—it is not for me to describe the holy, happy, blissful hours in which her lover explained to her that she had no more to fear from Lawyer Grange. Ah, well—we have been married these ten years—Lakeleath is big enough for us all, little ones included, and I think I may venture to say that a brighter, happier, or more beautiful creature moves not on the earth, than Oriana, the lovely creole.

LAMB-ING AN ASS.

A pompous young ass of the English navy had mainly monopolized the conversation at the table of a friend, where Charles Lamb was an honored guest. His conduct appeared to show that he considered that he alone had a right to talk, which, Lamb observing, he became the subject of some of those keen satires which the latter was capable of administering.

"That is a most extraordinary circumstance which you mention," said Lamb, "I wonder he had not immediately ceased to exist."

"O, no o-o, not at all; bullet wound, don't you see; but a cannon-ball, don't you observe, is a different matter? Once on the 'Terrific Johannesbull,' (478 gun-ship, ye kno') there was a sailor who mounted the swawouds—a ball came, and took off his 'ands and harms. He dwopped of caws; but wile he was dwopping, don't you see, there came another cannon-ball which struck him abaft, and took off both of his legs. It couldn't possibly 'ave 'appened, you observe, in ten cases out of five, in the most tewific engagemment."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed Lamb, "and you saw this yourself?"

"I saw it as plain, p'rhaps, on the 'ole, plainer than what I see you at this moment."

"Ah! was the seaman saved? You say he was dropped a 'elpless 'ulc into the hocean; but was he ultimately saved?"

"Good heaven! no!—harms gone—legs shot hoff, don't you see?—ow could he swim? Lost, of caws!"

"What a pity!" said Lamb, musingly—"if that man had been saved, he might hav' become an ornament to society!"—London Times.

Curious Matters.

The Romance of Life.

Thirty years ago a man named Wood sailed from New Bedford as mate of a whaler, leaving at home a young wife and an infant child. The ship in which he sailed was cast away in the South Sea Islands, and he was reckoned among the lost. Six years ago the child, now grown to manhood, removed from New Bedford to Cincinnati, taking his mother with him. One morning recently a gray-headed stranger called at his residence and inquired for his mother. She was called into the room, and after gazing at the stranger a moment, asked his business. "Do you not know me, Martha?" he said, and as the sound of his voice, like the memory of an olden melody, met her ear, she gave vent to a hysterical cry, and fainted in the arms which were opened to receive her. The long lost husband, after numberless reverses and incredible hardships, had returned to find her whom he had left a young and blooming bride, far advanced in the evening of life, while the infant, upon whose lips when last he saw him he had imprinted a father's kiss, and who could then scarcely lip his name, was now a stalwart man, and the head of a family.

A Starvation Religion.

A sect has sprung up in Liverpool, England, under the lead of Mr. Thomas Angel, calling themselves "Angelites, or Human Nature Conquerors," who live without food, and who meet daily, mornings and evenings, in Sunderland Street, to illustrate their doctrines and to enroll members, by signing a declaration that they will neither eat nor drink. They have put forth a printed pamphlet stating their views, and including a report of their sermons and the manner they adopt to overcome languidness and the total want of food, also, the eminent physician, Dr. Bickerstith's, certificate of the excellent health of the members of this extraordinary society, with their apology for "eating no food."

Singular Encounter.

A few days ago a Glasgow gentleman, while standing on Strone-pler, heard an unusual sound proceeding from below, and on looking down he saw a water-rat in the claws of a large crab. The rat occasionally brought his antagonist to the surface, when the latter seemed to give him a sharper nip, as the rat no sooner got above water than he squeaked dolefully, and began to sink again. Unfortunately, victory remained with neither, for the gentleman gave the crab a gentle tap with his stick, when our crustaceous friend let go and sank to the bottom in a great hurry, while the rat swam to the stone-work of the pier and boiled into a hole.

Remarkable Courage.

An instance of extraordinary courage and presence of mind occurred recently at St. Joseph, Missouri. A Mrs. Wake, who lives on Grand River, went, about midnight, to the river bank to call her son, who lives on the opposite side, but approached too near the edge, and was precipitated some distance over a steep bank into the rushing waters. She recollected hearing that if a person would keep the arms under water, and attempt to swim, there was no danger. She did so, and by this means gained the opposite side of the river, but found the bank so steep and high that it was impossible to get out. She took courage, and with great presence of mind, deliberately swam back to the side from which she started.

Habits of Grasshoppers.

A Gilded correspondent of the Colorado (Texas) Citizen gives some curious facts in relation to the grasshoppers which have recently swarmed in that region. He says: "They have an especial fondness for wheat and cotton, but don't take an kindly to corn. The only vegetable they spare is the pumpkin. The most deadly poisons have had no effect upon them; fumes of sulphur they rather like than otherwise; mosquito nets they devour greedily; clothes hung out to dry they esteem a rarity; blankets and gunnysacks they don't appear to fancy. They swim the broadest creeks in safety, sun themselves awhile, and then go on. The whole mass appear to start and move at the same time, travelling for an hour or two, devouring everything in their way, and then suddenly cease, and not move perhaps for a week, during which time no feeding is noticed; and finally, they carefully avoid the sea-coast."

Burying alive.

The recent news from Utah contains an item which illustrates the burial customs of the Shoshonee Indians in rather a striking manner. A brother of the chief of the tribe recently died, and his relatives, in addition to the killing of his favorite horses over his grave, buried with him, alive, a little boy of whom the deceased was very fond, so that he might accompany him to the spirit land. They wrapped the boy up, alive, in a blanket, and placing him in the grave with the corpse, buried them together.

Curious Will.

An eccentric person, the Marguis Mahair, of Florence, just deceased, has ordered by his will, a portion of his fortune to be invested, and the interest to be paid to the most hump-backed man in Tuscany. The recipient of the income is to be chosen by twelve other hump-backed men, each of whom for his trouble is to be rewarded with a gold medal bearing the effigy of Æscop.

Curious Freak of Nature.

The Hightstown (N. J.) Essex gives an account of a curious freak of nature, in the shape of a log containing three different kinds of wood—white oak, maple and hickory—all grown together in the most perfect manner. The outside of the log had the appearance of white oak, and only after cutting off the end could the strange amalgamation be discovered.

Singular Discovery.

A singular discovery was made at Provincetown, Mass., lately, of a stone wall seven or eight feet below a surface of sand. It is supposed to have been built more than a century ago, and probably soon after the landing of the pilgrims, as the earth above it was sixty years ago covered with a growth of small trees and shrubbery. The stones of which it is composed must have been conveyed there in small vessels.

A Novelty.

There is a tame rat on board the "City of Memphis," says the Appeal, which stands up on his hind feet when ordered, lifts his master's hand, and kisses him, climbs up over him, holds a stick in his fore paw, and stands up like a soldier; comes when called, goes away when told to do so, and enters his box or cage as an obedient child would at the request of its parents.

Curious Dove Story.

A gentleman of this city, says the Boston Traveller, who has a dove-cot at his residence at the west end, relates the following incident as having occurred last week: In the cot were a male and female dove and two squabs. The male squab having died, the elderly dove drove from his nest his female mate, and promoted to his bed and board the young female squab, pecking at and driving from his cot the female dove. Finally upon one occasion, when the female appeared at the door of the cot, the male sallied out, pecked at her, and then drove her away. The persecuted mother flew down to a perch below, where, with her head under her wing, she remained for a short time, and then fell suddenly to the ground. The inmates of the house, who had witnessed the proceeding, immediately went out, and ascertained that the dove was dead, but no wound was found sufficient to cause death. Possibly she died of a broken heart, from the brutal treatment of her false and sickle mate.

Singular Cases of Fatality.

In Switzerland once, a man was shaving at a window, when some comical fellow threw a snowball. The missile struck the razor, and cut the man's throat, and he died from the effects of the wound. This was in the canton of Claris, and since then the authorities have decreed that whoso throws a snowball shall be sentenced to six years' solitary confinement. Sixteen years after the dire event, the youth, Hans Hallschider, now grown to manly years, stood, on the anniversary of the dread deed, at the same window, shaving himself with the razor of the snowball victim. He raised the low sash, and while holding the glittering blade in his left hand, stretched out his neck to gaze upon a beautiful young girl going by. Suddenly a wild blast of wind howled through the air—it shook the window, which had lost its lead—the sash fell on the back of his neck—the upturned razor edge was against his throat, and his head, completely dismembered by the blow, fell in the street at the feet of the lady, who was his affianced bride.

Children poisoned by India-rubber Air-balls.

Two children have been poisoned at Hoxton by inhaling colored matter used in the manufacture of India-rubber air-balls. The evidence of the father showed that when one of these balls burst, a powder would fly around the room like smoke, and then disappear. The children sometimes picked up a ball and sucked it. The cause of death appears to be traced to the deleterious ingredients used by the poor man in his trade.

Singular Suicide.

A widow named Rogers, residing at Watertown, New York, aged seventy years, lately committed suicide by hanging herself. It was evident she had been carefully planning her death beforehand, for her grave clothes were found laid out upon her bed, and arranged in such a manner that they would be the first object to attract the attention of any person entering the room.

A Curious Truth.

The bones of a bird are hollow, and filled with air. If a string be tied tightly around the neck of a sparrow, so that no air can enter its lungs, and its leg broken, it will live. Respiration will take place by means of the broken bone.

A Century Woman.

Mrs. Rodah Douglas, of Freetown, Mass., now in her ninety-ninth year, has just recovered from a severe attack of erysipelas, and bids fair to see her 100th birthday. A few days ago, by way of pastime, she went up stairs, and spun six skeins of linen. She distinctly remembers events which occurred more than ninety years ago. Not long ago, while sitting alone, by some means she rocked over backwards, and was considerably hurt; but, as she said, "scrabbled up before any of the folks could come into the room, and said nothing about it for several days." She thinks young people like herself should not fuss about trifles.

Rules to administer Medicine.

For an adult, suppose the dose to be one drachm; under 1 year will require only one-twelfth 5 grains; under 2 years, one-eighth 8 grains; under 3 years, one sixth 10 grains; under 4 years, one quarter 15 grains; under 7 years, one-third 1 scruple; under 14 years, one-half 1-2 drachm; under 20 years, two-thirds 2 scruples; above 21 years the full dose of 1 drachm; 65 the inverse gradation of the above. This is an excellent table for regulating the doses of medicine: a mixture, powder, pill or draught may be proportioned to a nicety by attention to the above rules.

Manuscript Copy of Dante.

From Florence news comes of a manuscript copy of Dante turning up, all in the handwriting of Petrarch. It has stood the test of careful comparison with all the known specimens of his penmanship, which are by no means few or scarce. Almost all the books he read were enriched by marginal notes from his hand, and there is one touching memorandum in a volume kept at the Laurentian Library, "This day I learn the death of Donna Laura."

Something Wonderful.

The Richmond (Kentucky) Messenger mentions a circumstance which is probably without a parallel in the animal kingdom. It is a colt with but one eye. It was foaled on the farm of Mr. Elisha Roberts, in Madison County. The eye is considerably larger than the usual size, and in the middle of the forehead.

Quaint Title.

The following is the title of a pamphlet in verse, written two hundred years ago: "Tobacco battered, and the pipes shattered (about their ears who idly idolize so base and barbarous a Weed), by a volley of Holy Shot thundered from Mount Helicon." It is perhaps the earliest satire on the use of tobacco.

Woolly Calf.

A curious freak of nature has appeared in Hartford, in the shape of a woolly calf. The whole body is covered with black wool, the horns look like a lamb's, and he butts with them just as a sheep does.

Treasure Trove.

A child in Birmingham, not long ago, putting his hand into a hole down which a mouse had run, found a tin box containing a hundred £1 notes, issued thirty or forty years ago.

The Florist.

Fair is the rocky fount, the blossomed hedge,
Groves stained with golden light;
Fair is the star of eve, that on the edge
Of purple clouds shines bright.

FREDERICK VON MATTHISSON.

Ornamental Gardening.

In the ornamental department of gardening, in this country, there is room for many improvements. The immense number of indigenous trees, shrubs and plants, which are scattered through our woods and forests, afford facilities for beautifying the pleasure garden, which is often overlooked. The passion for exotics which often disappoint the ardent cultivator, has caused the almost total neglect of the humble native plants and splendid shrubs. The Shad tree and flowering Cornel are worthy a place in any hedge. Look into our own woods and hedge-rows, and there will be found many plants beautiful as they grow, but susceptible of vast improvement by careful cultivation.

Cuttings.

Cuttings may be struck in the open ground, and in any common soil, without covering; but these cuttings are only of those plants which strike readily. When struck in pots, it is customary to fill the pots half or entirely full of silver sand, to prevent the stalk of the cutting from having too much moisture round it. Those cuttings which are most liable to be injured by moisture, such as heaths, etc., are struck in pots filled entirely with sand; but as there is no nourishment in sand, most cuttings do best with the lower end in earth, and with sand about an inch or two inches deep at the top of the pot to keep the stem dry and prevent it from rotting.

Faded Flowers.

The withered roses and other flowers should be cut off as soon as they fade, as nothing disfigures a flower-garden more than dead leaves and flowers, and they are often injurious to the plants, as insects are very apt to collect on the decayed blossoms—especially of roses. Some of the herbaceous plants that have done flowering may be cut down, and Pelargoniums, German and Russian Stocks, etc., should now take the place of the common bulbs. The annual plants sown in May should now be thinned out, and cuttings of greenhouse plants put in the open border under hand glasses.

Cosmos.

Mexican plants, generally grown as annuals, but which have tuberous roots like the dahlia, and may be treated like that plant. The flowers are very showy, and of a reddish purple; and the seeds, when the plants are grown as annuals, should be sown in March or April in the open ground, or in autumn if the young plants are protected well during the winter. The plants will grow four or five feet high in any common garden soil.

Hieracium.

The common Hawkweed. British plants, with large yellow flowers, which will grow freely in any light rich soil. They are propagated by seed or division of the roots. The name is said to be derived from the juice of these plants being formerly given to hawks to clear and improve their sight.

Chinese mode of Layering.

The Chinese method of layering consists in wounding a branch, and then surrounding the place with moist earth contained either in flower-pot or basket. The manner of layering has the one great advantage of producing a young tree which will flower and fruit while yet of very small size. It is generally applied to camellias, orange-trees and magnolias; but will do equally well for any other tree or shrub. When a plant is thus to be layered, a ring of bark is first taken off, and then a flower-pot is procured, open at one side, so as to admit the branch, and some moss and earth is put in the pot, and the opening in the side of the pot closed with a piece of wood or bark. It may be kept in its place by wires or strings. When the layer is well rooted, the branch below the pot is cut off, and the young plant transferred with its ball of earth entire to the ground. A simpler way is to substitute a piece of lead for the pot.

Grafting.

The kinds of grafting best adapted for ladies, are the common splice; the most simple and surest—cleft-grafting, side-grafting and in-arching. In splice-grafting the scion and stock are of the same thickness; both cut slanting, so as exactly to fit; and there is a dovetail notch in the stock for the scion to rest on. When the scion is perfectly fitted to the stock, it is tied with bass matting and afterwards covered with grafting wax or clay. Few of the climbing roses are fragrant, but that defect, if defect it is called, may be remedied by grafting fragrant scions upon the climbing stock.

Props for Plants.

Props for border-flowers may be made of laths split, but perhaps the best mode, because least artificial and ostentatious, is that of using straight rods of hazel, or some such wood, with the bark on. The object in using the rods of this kind is to avoid display. The walls against which plants are trained should never be of red brick or white washed, but should be painted a subdued tone. A brown color or tint like the bark of a tree displays the best taste, and improves the appearance of the foliage and blossoms.

Feather Grass.

A beautiful kind of grass, well worth growing to form tufts in flower borders, from its feathery lightness and graceful habit of growth. It should be grown in light rich soil, and it is propagated by seeds or dividing the roots.

Erythraea.

The lesser Centaury. Little pink-flowered plants, mostly annual, suitable for rockwork. The seeds should be sown in autumn, in the open border, and the plants removed in patches, with earth attached to the rockwork in the spring.

Groundsel-tree.

A shrub with bluish green leaves, and rather pretty flowers, which are produced in autumn. It will grow in any common garden soil, but is killed in severe winters if in an exposed situation. It may be propagated by cuttings or layers.

Helenias.

Perennial plants, natives of North America, which produce spikes of pink or white flowers: are generally sown in peat soil in a moist situation. They are propagated by seeds or division of the roots.

Management of Oleanders.

Oleanders should be regularly watered every day; but as no water should ever be allowed to remain in a stagnant state about their roots, the pots in which they are grown should have no saucers. They should also, in order to insure the highest degree of thrift, be re-potted once a year, and the soil be shaken out from the roots, as they are plants which throw out a good deal of excrementitious matter, which poisons the soil in which they grow. This re-potting should take place in spring, and after it has been performed the plants should be watered and set in the shade for a day or two. As soon as they begin to grow, they should have plenty of light and air, and they should be regularly watered twice a day. Thus treated, the oleander will grow rapidly, and throw out such large bunches of flowers as to form truly splendid objects.

Shading.

A very important point to be observed in transplanting is shading. Tender plants often die because not carefully protected from the heat of the sun. If it were possible to transplant without injuring the tiny fibrous roots, and if the plants were immediately supplied with plenty of water, shading would not be required. An inverted flower-pot is useful for that purpose. Let it be placed over the plant during the day, removed at night when the dews begin to fall, and replaced before the moisture is dried from the leaves.

Rule to be observed in Transplanting.

Never bury the collar of a plant, except a few annuals, such as balsams and a few other plants which send out roots above the collar of the plant. Most plants thrive very much better after a careful transplanting. Hyacinths do not bear transplanting at all; in fact very few bulbous rooted plants do. As a general rule it is best never to bury the collar of the plant, and take up a large lump of earth round the roots.

Benthamia.

A very handsome evergreen shrub, with large, white, showy flowers, which are succeeded by scarlet fruit having the appearance of a large strawberry. It is somewhat tender, and requires the protection of a wall. It thrives best in loam, and may be propagated by layers, cuttings or seeds, which it produces in abundance.

Flower-Pots.

Flower-pots of red, porous kind of earthenware are much better for the plants than the more ornamental kinds. Glazed pots are most suitable for plants kept in balconies which are much exposed to the air, as they do not admit of transpiration from the sides, and consequently the earth contained in them does not soon become dry.

Celsia.

Half hardy annuals and biennials, with showy, yellow flowers. They are generally raised in a hot bed, though if the season be a forward one they may grow freely in the open air. The C. urticifolia bears scarlet flowers, and is included in the genus Alonsoa.

Glechoma.

The Ground Ivy. There are two species: one with blue flowers, which is a British weed; and the other, with pink flowers, which is a native of Hungary. They will both grow in any common garden soil, and may be increased by dividing the roots.

Plants for Dwelling-Houses.

Among the flowers and plants which thrive well in dwelling-houses, none altogether excel the various scarlet and other bedding geraniums. There is a large family called "bedding," because they are used in great numbers to turn out in beds, and they are adapted for this purpose because they continue to grow and bloom all the summer and autumn, and in that particular differ from the still larger family of show geraniums—called more generally pelargoniums—which have their season of flowering only a month or six weeks. Of the bedding kinds, the best are those with red or pink flowers; there are some with white, but they are tame and uninteresting. By obtaining a few of the best scarlet and pink, at bedding-out time, at a nursery, and ordering the dealer to pot them in a size large enough to carry them through the summer, we may, with care, have them in good bloom almost up to Christmas. But now we come to an important contingency—we ought to have said with good management—never water them till the surface of the pot is dry, and then give it them so that all the soil in the pot is wetted; let the water all drain through, and throw it away, for they must not stand in it. Occasionally stir the surface of the mould in the pot, and take care that there be no vacancy between the earth and the side of the pot where you water them, for if there be, the water will run through without soaking into the middle of the ball of earth the plant is growing in. The stirring of the surface is to prevent that kind of shrinking that may be observed among plants that are undisturbed for a long time. All discoloured leaves should be picked off.

The Passion Flower.

The annexed interpretation of this justly celebrated and much admired flower will be found interesting: "The leaves resemble the spear that pierced our Saviour's side; the tendrils the cords that bound his hands, or whips that scourged him; the ten petals the apostles, Judas having betrayed, and Peter deserted; the pillars in the centre the cross or tree; the stamina the hammer; the style the nails; the inner circle around the centre pillar the crown of thorns; the radiance the glory; the white in the flower the emblem of purity; and the blue the type of heaven. On one species, the passiflora alata, even drops of blood are seen upon the cross or tree. This flower continues three days open, and then disappears, thus denoting the resurrection."

Herbaceous Plants and Bulbs.

All herbaceous plants and bulbs should be set out in the fall. Many wake up to the importance of these flowers when they see them in bloom, but when the time for planting comes they are forgotten. Take plants of all desirable sorts in the spring or summer, when in flower, and plant early in the fall, and the following spring you will have plenty of flowers.

Flowering Rush.

A British aquatic plant, producing pretty pink flowers. When cultivated, the seeds should be sown in loamy soil at the bottom of the aquarium or pond where it is to grow, or in a pot plunged to a considerable depth; or it may be increased by dividing the roots.

Monocanthus.

The Monk Flower. An orchideous epiphyte from Demerara and Brazil, requiring the usual treatment of similar plants.

The Housewife.

A nice Onion Sauce.

Peel and thinly slice four or five onions, put them into a saucepan with a piece of butter; stir the onion until browned; then stir in slowly a spoonful of flour, four tablespoonsful of any kind of nice broth, a little pepper and salt; boil this for a few minutes; watch, to prevent its scorching; then add a wine glass full of claret, and the same of mushroom catsup. Strain it through a hair sieve. Serve hot. This is a very nice gravy for steaks.

Potage a L'Anglaise.

Put a good sized marrow bone into a soup pot, and pour on it one gallon of water; wash one pint of split peas and put in; let this simmer slowly three hours; add a half teaspoonful of salt and a little black pepper. Toast nicely two or three slices of bread, butter them and cut into square pieces. Put them into the tureen, and pour the potage through a cullender, and mash the peas through into the tureen. Serve hot.

Lamb.

This requires much attention in the roasting. All young meats should be well cooked. For a sauce, wash clean a handful of fresh green mint, remove the leaves from the stems, mince it very fine and put it into a sauce boat, and stir in one teaspoonful of brown sugar and four tablespoonsful of good wine vinegar. Green peas is the vegetable eaten with lamb.

Hard Tea Biscuit.

Two pounds of flour; a quarter of a pound of butter; a salt-spoonful of salt; three gills of milk. Cut up the butter, and rub it in the flour; then add the salt and milk. Knead the dough for half an hour; make it into cakes about as large round as a small teacup, and half an inch thick. Prick them with a fork; bake them in a moderate oven, until they are a light brown.

Champagne Cider.

Good cider, pale, one hoghead; spirit, three gallons; honey or sugar, 20 pounds. Mix, and let them rest for a fortnight, then fine with skimmed milk, 1-2 gallon. This will be very pale; and a similar article, when bottled in champagne bottles, and stoppered and labelled, has been often sold to the ignorant for champagne. It opens very brisk if managed properly.

Arrow-Root Blanmange.

To two and a half spoonful of pure Jamaica arrow-root, a quart of milk, a large spoonful of crushed sugar, a spoonful of rose-water and a little salt. Reserve a gill of milk to wet the arrow-root, and boil the rest. When it boils up, stir in the arrow-root, and boil it up again a minute or two; add the sugar, salt and rose-water, and put it into the mould.

To pickle Cucumbers.

Trim and wash them in salt and water, drain, and put them into the bottles, add a little mace, cloves, capsicum and mustard-seed, then cover them with white vinegar nearly boiling hot; cork immediately.

Fresh Fruit Trifle.

Stew gooseberries or apples, or bruise raspberries or strawberries, lay them upon soft custard or upon cake dipped in cream, and cover it with whip.

Cream Fritters.

Mix a handful of flour, with three whole eggs, and the yolks of six, four pounded macaroons, some dried orange-flowers, browned in sugar, a little candied lemon-peel chopped very fine, half a pint of cream, half a pint of milk, and a lump of sugar; boil the whole over a gentle fire for a quarter of an hour, till the cream turns to a thick paste; then let it cool in a dish well floured, shaking flour all over it. When cold, cut the paste into small pieces, roll them in your hands till they become round, and fry them of a good color; when you serve them, powder them all over with sugar.

Gooseberry Champagne.

"Ferment together," says Mr. Francis, "five gallons of white gooseberries, mashed, with four and a half gallons of water, add six pounds of sugar, four pounds and a half of honey, one ounce of finely-powdered white tartar, one ounce of dry orange and lemon-peel, and half a gallon of white brandy. This will produce nine gallons. Before the brandy is added the mixture must be strained and put into a cask. This will be found equal to Mrs. Primrose's celebrated gooseberry wine (See the "Vicar of Wakefield")."

Soups.

Vegetable soup. Two turnips, four carrots, four potatoes, one cabbage, one parsnip, parsley or celery; chop them all fine, add a spoonful of rice, and three quarts of water, and boil them three hours. Strain through a cullender, let it all boil up again, and add a pint of milk or cream, thickened with flour.

Cheese Cake.

Mix together one quart of cheese (curd), four eggs, half a grated nutmeg, a small portion of cream, a piece of butter as large as an egg, and as many dried currants, and as much sugar as is agreeable to your taste. Flavor with brandy.

Calf's Foot Blanco-Mange.

One quart of the stock, prepared as for jelly, one pint of cream, flavored to the taste, and half a pound of sugar. Let it boil up once, and strain it into the moulds through a gauze sieve. Cool it upon ice or in cold water.

Boiled Oustard.

Beat—very light—five eggs; place one quart of milk over the fire, and when it comes to a boil, take it off the fire and stir in your eggs; season with whatever essence you prefer, and let it again come to a boil.

Of Beef as Food.

Ox beef is considered the best; heifer beef is excellent where well fed, and is most suitable for small families. If you want the best, choose that which has a fine smooth grain—the lean of a bright red; the fat white or nearly so.

To keep Muslins of a good Color.

Never wash muslins or any kind of white cotton goods, with linen; for the latter deposits or discharges a gum and coloring matter every time it is washed, which discolors and dyes the cotton. Wash them by themselves.

Fried Sweet Corn.

Cut tender corn off the cob. Put it in a pan, and add sufficient water to moisten it, a little salt and butter, and fry to the liking.

Bedding.

Many persons think it conducive to health to sleep very hard. This is only the case with peculiar constitutions. Generally speaking, most people will sleep more comfortably, and feel more refreshed afterwards, on a moderately soft bed or mattress. Even in summer, and in warm climates, a mattress should not be so hard as to have no elasticity. If the mattress is sufficiently thick to prevent the feather bed beneath from rising or swelling around you, the proper end is answered as far as health is in question; and certainly the comfort is much greater than if all beneath you is so hard and compact that you cannot but feel as if sleeping almost on a floor of wood or stone; as is often the case, when a thick, solid, hair mattress has nothing under it but one equally solid of straw.

Irish Stew.

Cut up two pounds of the neck of the mutton into small cutlets, which put into a proper sized stewpan with some of the fat of the mutton, season with three spoonsful of salt, half an ounce of pepper, the same of sugar, six middle-sized onions, a quart of water; set them to boil and simmer for half an hour, then add six middling-sized potatoes, cut them in halves or quarters, stir it together, and let it stew gently for about one hour longer; if too fat remove it from the top, but if well done the potatoes would absorb all, and eat very delicate; any other part of the mutton may be served in the same way.

Bed-Room Carpets.

The carpet on a chamber will last and look well much longer if there are extra places to lay round the bed, tacking them up and shaking them every day. In front of the washing-stand, and some distance beneath, it is well to have a breadth of oil-cloth nailed down upon the carpet, which will thus be saved from much injury by the splashing of water in emptying pitchers and basins.

Yellow Almond Sweetmeats.

Blanch a pound of sweet almonds; wash them in cold water, and when quite dry, pound them with a sufficient quantity of yolks of eggs into a fine but rather stiff paste; add to them a pound of powdered sugar, and the rinds of two lemons grated; knead the paste well with your hands, first sprinkling the table with sugar. Form the paste into what figures you prefer.

Yeast Dumplings.

Make a dough with a table-spoonful of yeast, a little salt, and warm milk, and flour; set it to rise. When light, flour your hands, and make it in balls the size of a common apple; throw them into boiling water, and cover close. In half an hour take them up with a skimmer; serve plain, with butter or with a sweet sauce.

Cabinet Pudding.

Boil one pint of milk, with a piece of lemon-peel, pour it on one ounce of sponge biscuit, let it soak half an hour, then add three eggs, half an ounce of currants, and a very little sugar; steam it in a buttered mould, lined with raisins, one hour.

Bread and Butter Pudding.

Butter a tart-dish well and sprinkle some currants all round it, then lay in a few slices of bread and butter; boil one pint of milk, pour it on two eggs well whipped, and then on the bread and butter; bake it in a hot oven for half an hour.

Beefsteak Pudding.

Prepare a good crust as for a fruit pudding. Take beefsteak cut in small pieces, a few slices of very nice salt pork, season with pepper, salt, summer savory and a small piece of onion if fancied; dust flour in your meat, put the crust in the cloth, the meat in the crust, tie tightly and boil three hours or a little more. When cut open pour in a little melted butter. A very little experience will teach any one to make this pudding, and to those who are in the habit of broiling or frying steak, it will soon commend itself for the saving.

Cleaning Knives and Forks.

It is an excellent way to have, at dinner-time, on a side-table, a deep, tall, japanned or painted mug or can, filled with sufficient hot water to cover the blades of the knives and forks, but not enough to reach to their handles, which the hot water would split or loosen. As the plates are taken from the table, the servant who waits should at once stand the knives and forks upright (blade downwards) in this vessel of water, which will prevent the grease from drying on them, and make them very easy to wash when dinner is over.

Fig Paste for Constipation.

Cut up small one pound of figs, and mix it with two ounces of senna carefully picked over, and one tea-cupful of molasses; stew it till it becomes thoroughly mixed and firm; then cool it. A piece about half as large as a fig will generally be sufficient.

Freckles and Sunburns.

After washing in cold water, use a little of the following lotion: mix a teaspoonful of diluted muriatic acid with an ounce of rose-water, eight ounces of water, and one ounce of rectified spirits of wine.

Spice Plaster.

Pulverised cloves, cinnamon, and Cayenne pepper, half an ounce each; mix, and add flour and wine of galls, or diluted spirits, to form this plaster; lay it hot on the region of the stomach. It is excellent for pains and spasms.

To make Yeast.

Boil five large potatoes, mash them fine, add gradually one quart of cold water and three table-spoonful of sugar. Stir in half a pint of yeast, set it to rise; when light, cork it, and keep in a cool place.

To make Sticking Salve.

Three pounds resin, half a pound of mutton tallow, half a pound of beeswax, and a table-spoonful of sulphur; melted, poured into cold water, and worked and pulled an hour.

Keeping Cider sweet.

A pint of mustard seed, put in a barrel of cider, will preserve it sweet for a number of months. I have drunk fall cider in the month of May, which was kept sweet by this means.

Fever Draught.

Boil an ounce and a half of tamarinds, three ounces of currants, two of stoned raisins, in three pints of water. Boil them down one-third, and strain them.

To remove Freckles.

An ounce of alum, and an ounce of lemon juice, in a pint of rose-water.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

BLEEDERS.

In Felt's Annals of Essex County, we find a very curious account of families in the town of Hamilton who are called bleeders, from the great propensity of their bodies to bleed profusely even from very slight wounds. He says that there are four families in the town, all of which are more or less related, some of the members of which exhibit this peculiarity. There are five individuals in all, and they have inherited this tendency to hemorrhage from their ancestors, some of whom have died from wounds which are not considered by any means dangerous to people in general. These people are afraid to submit to the operation of the lancet, for fear of fatal effects. A cut, or other wound upon them, at first assumes the common appearance; but after a few days, the injured part begins to send forth almost a steady stream of blood. This continues for several days, when the discharge changes to a colorless fluid, resembling water. A cone is in the mean time formed over the wound by the coagulated blood, and the discharge continues through a small aperture in the centre of this cone, until the latter falls off, when the discharge ceases. These bleeders often bleed abundantly at the nose, and are subject to severe and unaccountable rheumatism. This hemorrhage first appeared in a family by the name of Appleton, who brought it with them from England, and it is transmitted from generation to generation. None but male members of the family are bleeders, and their immediate sons are not so; but the sons of their daughters exhibit the peculiarity. There is, however, no definite information as to what proportion of the male children of the bleeder's daughters resemble him in this respect, and that proportion has been found to be altogether uncertain. The circumstances narrated by the historian are certainly very remarkable, and seem to indicate some law of human generation which has heretofore been guessed at, by those who have noted the resemblance in the mental peculiarities of sons to their mothers, and daughters to their fathers.

CHARLES MACKAY.—This gentleman is so well pleased with America, that he is coming back again in a couple of years.

PAPER FROM BEETS.

Among the new inventions recently made in England, is the preparation of paper from beet root. The beet is extensively used in making sugar, and this new invention converts the pulp of fibrous matter, which is left after extracting the saccharine properties, into paper by a very easy and economical process. This pulp is mixed with cotton or linen, in various proportions, from ten to eighty per cent., and the result is, a paper stronger and more durable than that composed of any other materials, and, at the same time, more compact, tenacious and flexible. This paper is also impermeable to humidity, under all circumstances, and is therefore unaffected by climate. The beet pulp also operates as sizing for the paper, so that the use of rosin, glue, etc., for size, is dispensed with. It gives a fine, vellumy surface to the paper, which fits it to be printed upon without wetting down; and to the dry printing it gives a clear, sharp impression, like wood engraving. The resemblance, in this respect, to Chinese paper, leads us to suppose that a similar ingredient has long been in use among that ancient people. In the proportion of fifty per cent. to cotton, the beet makes a very superior paper, equal in strength, flexibility and color to linen, but with a much finer surface. The London Times is to be printed on this new paper, and it is estimated that the saving thereby will amount to $100,000 a year, in the expenses of that establishment. The British government have also adopted a coarser kind for cartridges, which is pronounced by the authorities at the War Office to be "vastly cheaper and better than any material heretofore used." It is quite natural for John Bull to resort to anything that will enable him to beat his enemies—even to beet root cartridges.

BACK NUMBERS.—We can still supply all the back numbers of our magazine to January 1st 1858. When subscribing, please say at what time it is desired to have the subscription commence.

AN IMPOSSIBILITY.—There is one thing a drunken man cannot do—drive a sulkey without getting his legs mixed up with the wheels of the vehicle.

MODERN FIRE-ARMS.

The past twenty years have witnessed many wonderful discoveries in the arts and sciences, and many practical improvements based thereon. Man is naturally a fighting animal, and therefore, as a matter of course, a due share of his attention has been devoted to perfecting his implements of strife. The improvements in guns and cannon have fully kept pace with those in the more peaceful implements of human occupation. The Paixan and the Lancaster cannon have offset the sewing and the reaping machines, as well as the Colt's revolver and the Minnie rifle, the steel pen and the magnetic telegraph. Gun cotton has sprung up to rival gunpowder, and that in turn has been so far improved upon, that the Italian assassins who lie in wait to murder Louis Napoleon, make use of an exploding powder sixteen hundred times as powerful as common gunpowder.

Even sedate old Massachusetts is brushing up her old firelocks, and swapping them off for something more powerful. The volunteer troops of the State are henceforth to be armed with the rifle musket, a newly-invented arm, of great power, which has recently been adopted by the United States. It is to be used with an elongated, expansion ball, and provided with rear sight, for greater accuracy of aim. A clasp bayonet is also attached, and the famous Maynard primer, to be used instead of the percussion cap. This new weapon, with a charge of powder one third less than that used in the present musket, will drive a ball one half heavier than is now used, completely through a three inch pine plank, at a thousand yards distance; while the old musket will send its ball only three hundred yards, and barely penetrate the plank. The rifled chamber also renders the aim of the new weapon much more accurate than the old one, even at a larger range than the latter will carry. With this superior piece, the Massachusetts volunteers will be a much more effective substitute for regular troops than heretofore; and they will now take greater interest in target practice than heretofore, because steadiness and accuracy of aim, and not chance, will decide the contest, and award the prize.

While on the topic of fire-arms, we desire to make mention of an application of the revolver principle and electric discharge to cannon, recently invented and exhibited at Buffalo, N. Y. The piece exhibited was a small brass gun, mounted upon wheels, and so constructed that a rotary cylinder, containing four charges, constitutes the breech. The charges in the cylinder are replenished to any extent, by means of a hopper, and the piece is fired as rapidly as a man can work an ordinary lever backward and forward. The piece is discharged by electricity, at the rate of thirty rounds per minute; and what is most singular in reference to the process, is, that the cylinder does not become heated, however rapid the discharge. This singular phenomenon is attributed to the electric fluid, the cylinder being rendered perfectly electrical by means of its connection with the battery and wires by which the ignition is caused. After two hundred rounds, fired in rapid succession, at the rate of about thirty rounds per minute, and without once using the swab, the breech, instead of being hot, was found to be much cooler than when the firing commenced. The inventor is confident that with good powder he can fire sixty rounds per minute. In this experiment the powder used was of very poor quality. The Buffalo Express states that the experiment was completely successful in demonstrating the utility of the invention, and that the inventors purpose to lay it before our government at an early day, in the meantime securing patents in Europe and this country.

THE ART OF WAR.—Marshal Piussegur affirms that all we know of the art is, "principally nothing." Some slight smattering of knowledge in the manner of fortifying places, and the attack and defence thereof, together with the evolutions and exercises of the battalion (many of which are perfectly impracticable in the face of the enemy), this is the summit of our acquirements, and we neither know nor trouble ourselves further.

JAPAN.—Mr. A. M. Gaskewitch is appointed Russian consul to Japan. He will be there with his wife who will be the first European woman ever allowed a residence in Japan. It is a nice country to keep house in, Japan blacking and candlesticks are so easily procured.

DRINKING SONGS.—A modern writer says that Bacchanalian songs can hardly be said to form a distinct or original department in the literature of this country. We are not at all ashamed of the fact.

ROSES.—Professor Agassiz thinks the creation of roses was coeval with that of the first woman—the fairest flower and the fairest creature given to the world at the same moment.

THE DEER IN FLORIDA.—The deer in Florida are said to be dying off rapidly of a strange disease, which nobody can account for.

BRITISH MILITARY SCHOOLS.

Whatever training British military officers have received, that has redounded to the credit of their nation upon the battle field, has been acquired, not in her military academies, but in actual service. While Great Britain was almost constantly engaged in war, their officers had abundant opportunity to learn by experience, and they did not fail to profit by the teachings of this severe school. In later days, however, since the field of Waterloo, she has had a period of comparative peace; her old generation of officers has passed away, and those who have succeeded them, have had little or no opportunity to learn the art of war by practising it. The substitution of military schools for the tented field, has not raised up for her a race of officers of which she has any great reason to be proud. Unlike France, she has not kept up a vigorous and effective system of military education in time of peace, but has trusted to luck for the capability of her officers. The consequence of this neglect of military training was strikingly manifested in the course of the Crimean war, where the British officers showed to great disadvantage beside the French. Superannuated drivellers or effeminate dandies, commanded her troops in many cases, and with little ability to serve the cause, or win honor for themselves. Not so the French. They had well-trained and disciplined officers, who understood their duty, and had the physical and mental force to perform it; and to them in a very great measure is due the partial success which crowned the cause of the allies in that war.

The foolish system of purchase which prevails in the British army, whereby a man's purse or that of his friends procures his commission, instead of his own qualifications or merits, has a direct tendency to bring persons of inferior abilities into the offices, and repress the promptings of emulation. If this privilege of buying commissions was restricted to those who had pursued a regular course of military education, and given evidence of their proficiency, it would be much less injurious in its effects upon the efficiency of the officers as a class. But it is not, and for the great majority of the army officers, it is open to any man who is a gentleman by birth, and can command the price. Consequently, though there are military schools in England, no young man who is desirous of having office in the army, feels at all obliged to commence his education in those seminaries, or in fact sees any feasible road to the object of his ambition through their portals. This non-essentiality of military education necessarily undervalues it, and leads the majority of aspirants for military commissions to look upon it as a thing of very little consequence.

There are in England three military seminaries, neither one of which, however, is designed for the general service of the army, like our own national academy at West Point; and neither of them is as thorough and effective as ours for educating and training young officers for the service. The first of these seminaries in point of age, is the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, which was founded more than a hundred years ago. This academy, as at present regulated, educates cadets for the artillery and engineer service, and to the extent of its capacity is open for the admission of any youth in the kingdom, whose friends may have interest to place him there. Successful graduates from this school are entitled to commissions in the artillery and engineer corps, without purchase. But the commissions thus acquired are regarded as inferior to those bought by money in the cavalry and infantry service, thus rendering military education a badge of inferiority among officers. The moral and intellectual discipline of this seminary is, however, very inferior, as confessed by British authorities, and the royal commissioners have recently condemned the whole system as failing in the object of rearing up competent officers.

The second seminary is the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, which was established in 1804. It was designed as a school for the sons of officers in the army, and bears somewhat the same relation to the line that the Woolwich academy does to the artillery. That is, cadets who go through the whole course of studies prescribed, and pass the requisite examinations in a satisfactory manner, are entitled to a commission in the cavalry or infantry, without purchase. But this college course is not the only avenue to a commission in those corps; and as matter of fact, very few of those who enter there go through the whole course, but are provided with commissions by their friends, by purchase, before their time is out; while at least five sixths of the candidates for commissioners never enter this college at all, but are appointed direct from civil life, either to the staff by family influence, or to the line by the weight of their purses. It is the decided opinion of the most competent judges of military matters in England, that this college neither exercises, nor in the nature of things, can exercise, any beneficial influence whatever upon the tone of the British army. So far as the standing of the institution is concerned, it is very low indeed, and it has comparatively few pupils. Any other nation but the English would sweep it away at once, as a useless expense; but John Bull's bump of veneration is so large that he can never allow that there is more wisdom to-day than there was yesterday.

The third educational establishment alluded to above, is the East India Company's College at Addiscombe, which was started in the year 1818. Here, cadets appointed by the directors are educated for the engineer, artillery and infantry service of the company. This is the best military school of the three, not only in its course of studies and discipline, but also in its bearing upon the military service. Excellence in this school is stimulated by the reward of merit; the best scholars being selected for appointment to the most desirable arm of the service. But the establishment has no effect on the army generally, it being confined solely to the East India Company's service, and being only a part of the machinery by which it carries on the gigantic scheme of plunder and outrage with which it has cursed India. For this kind of service no high-minded man would ever feel a preference; and therefore the aspirants for military honors, in England, are left entirely without a suitable establishment to qualify them for the duty which they seek. How different is this from our own country, which possesses in the West Point Academy an adequate, popular, and economical seminary for the thorough education of all the military officers which we require, in every branch of the service, and receives annually from its graduating class a body of officers fully accomplished in all the requisites of thorough soldiiership.

WAGGISH.—A dry sort of humorist complained to his minister that he must get a seat nearer the pulpit, "for," said he, "by the time your words reach me, they are as flat as dish-water." Not a very complimentary parishioner, certainly.

AN EXCELLENT INSTITUTION.—In Freeport, Illinois, they have a society called the "Anti-poke-your-nose-into-other-people's-business Society." That's a good institution.

THE QUEEN'S ENGLISH.—Mrs. Partington said her minister preached about "The Parody on the Probable Son." Another old lady called the young gentleman the "Prodigious Son."

FLARE UP.—Peter Flare, of Middletown, Md., has fallen heir to $50,000 by the death of a relative in Germany.

A PERSIAN FABLE.

One morning, just at the dawn of day, the great Abbas was going forth to hunt in a narrow valley which lies between two high mountains, when he met an uncommonly ugly man, at the sight of whom his horse started with such violence as nearly to unseat the king. Being greatly enraged at the bad omen, the monarch instantly ordered the ugly man's head to be struck off. The trembling peasant, while held fast by the executioner, in readiness to receive the death-blow, humbly supplicated to be informed what crime he had committed. "Your crime," said the imperious Abbas, "is your unlucky countenance, which is the first object I have met this morning, and has nearly caused me to fall from my horse." "Alas!" said the despairing victim, "what term must I apply to your majesty's countenance, which was the first object that met my eyes this morning, and is now to cause my death!" This witty reply so pleased the king, that he ordered the prisoner to be released, and gave him a purse of gold, instead of taking off his head. If we would, all of us, reflect upon our own short-comings and imperfections, when we feel inclined to censure the evil which we see in others, there would be fewer heads snapped off, and more gold purses circulating in community, greatly to the enhancement of our own peace of mind and the happiness of our fellow-creatures.

A SUBURBAN DIALOGUE.—"Mother wants to know if you wont please to lend her your preserving kettle, because as how she wants to preserve?" "We would with pleasure, boy; but the truth is, the last time we loaned it to your mother, she preserved it so effectually that we have never seen it since." "Well, you needn't be sassy about your old kettle. Guess it was full of holes when we borrowed it, and mother wouldn't troubled you again, only we seed you bringing home a new one."

COFFEE AND A COFFIN.—The following affecting epitaph may be found upon a tombstone in Connecticut:

"Here lies cut down like unripe fruit,
The wife of Deacon Amos Shute;
She died of drinking too much coffee,
Nanny Deminy eighteen forty."

CANINE.—A citizen of Hallowell has taken a fancy to a head of a dog that howls in his vicinity, and offers a reward of five dollars for a sight of the head, minus the body.

UNFORTUNATE.—Chicago has a public park, but its gates are too narrow to admit crinoline.

POPULAR ELOCUTION.

Our people are proverbially speech-makers—made so by our institutions of popular government, and encouraged to the effort by the general intelligence which prevails. Elocution is generally an exercise of our public schools; and debating clubs, town meetings and caucuses, confirm the habit of declamation in after life. It must have struck our readers with surprise to observe how few good public speakers there are, when they reflect upon the great number which we find among us, and the frequent opportunities they enjoy for exercising the talent. Why is this? Why is it that so few lawyers, ministers, and public lecturers, really speak well? We observe an almost universal deficiency of easy, natural and effective elocution. School teachers encounter it in their scholars, and labor in vain to obviate the objectionable tendency and supply the deficiency. It would seem that some earlier example than that of the teacher is before the mind of the child, which influences his habit of public speech.

This example continues through all the school training of the youth, and remains to influence him in after life. It is the example of the preacher of the gospel. This is constantly before the child from his earliest days of observation, and makes the first, the strongest, and most frequently repeated impression upon his mind. Every week the elocution of the minister in the pulpit is before him, to form and shape his impressions of public speaking; and the inevitable effect is to establish a habit of elocution which will resist the training of the school, and the experiences of after life. How important, then, does it become that the minister of the gospel should be a good speaker—that the indelible impression which he makes upon the habits of the young may be good, and not bad. This consideration is not sufficiently attended to by those who have the selection of public teachers of religion, elocution being regarded more as a pleasing adjunct to a minister's talents, than an all-powerful example for the unconscious imitation of the young.

We have often recognized the snuffing tone and twang of the conventicle, in the elocution of celebrated public speakers, and wondered where the obnoxious habit was contracted. A little reflection has satisfied us that the influence of the pulpit on the youthful mind has produced the mischief, and led us to the conclusion that the importance of correct pulpit elocution is not sufficiently appreciated. As a matter of curiosity, we have sometimes traced the early religious attendance of speakers to the same place of worship, simply by the peculiarity of their elocution—so marked and prominent were the characteristics implanted in their minds by the preacher whom they listened to in youth. This is a subject of great moment, and should command more attention from parish committees and others upon whom devolves the selection of ministers; for unless their ministers are good speakers, the children of the parish will contract vicious habits of elocution which can never be effaced.

GAMBLING IN LONDON.

A few years ago there were clubs, at which fines were inflicted on any member who was not drunk when the sittings were closed; whist clubs, where the members sat up to their knees in the rejected packs of cards, curtains being drawn between their faces to conceal any expression of disappointment at a bad hand. The practice is said to have been introduced in consequence of Mr. Fox losing a large sum of money by the cards being reflected on the bright surface of some large steel buttons which he wore. One of these card clubs had a singular constitution. It was called "The Never-Ending Club," and the law was that no one should quit the table until relieved by the arrival of a fresh member. Days passed, and even nights; and the fresh dawn beheld the parti carre, after a snore or two, commencing a new game.

OMNIBUS RULES.—Property left in an omnibus may be, and is usually, claimed by the passenger sitting next the leaver. Drivers of omnibuses must set the passengers down in the mud, so as not to obstruct the crossing; but if hard pressed by an opposition, need not set them down at all. Omnibus windows must be so constructed that they will not let down in summer, or pull up in winter.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.—Why is dew seldom formed at sea? Because most people object to a sea dew-sir in any shape. What has become of the candle, when it has been burnt? It has gone the way of the wicked. Why is a parson asking questions, the strangest of all individuals? Because he is the querist.

CONSCIENCE.—A retired merchant of Hartford acknowledges the receipt of $150 by letter, dated and postmarked New York city. It was sent for the purpose of making restitution.

MANKIND.—Mankind may be divided into three distinct classes: Superlative honest men; confirmed scoundrels; and—no men at all.

THE DUCHESS OF ORLEANS.

This illustrious lady, the widow of King Louis Philippe's eldest son, and at one time almost within reach of the throne of France as regent, died suddenly at Richmond, England, a few weeks since. She appears to have had the good fate to die serenely, as she, for her own part, chose to live. It is, of course, the contrast between the glorious promise of her youth, when a place on one of the chief thrones of Europe seemed secured for her, and the quiet and premature close of her days as a refugee, like the rest of the ex-royal family of France, in England, that offers to the moralist the latest illustration of the uncertainty of fortune. Six years before the fatal days in February, 1848, when the crown of France, her son's inheritance, was dashed to the ground in the shock of revolution, she, and the country of her adoption, suffered an irreparable bereavement by the accidental death of her husband. The Duke of Orleans was the only one of the sons of King Louis Philippe for whom the French people seemed to have any personal liking or respect, and it was believed that had his life been spared, the calamities that overtook the self-willed old king, involving in common ruin not only his whole family, but, temporarily at least, France itself, would in all human probability have been averted. Though throughout her widowhood she had lived in strict retirement, yet during those terrible three days of the year of revolution, the duchess showed herself thoroughly worthy of her husband, and of her position as a royal princess. Her courageously presenting herself to assert the claims of the Count de Paris before the tumultuous assemblage that filled the Chamber of Deputies, on the second day of the outbreak, was one of the heroic and romantic incidents of that period. But "the age of chivalry was gone" for her, as for Marie Antoinette; no generous intercession arose, and the latter princess passed into obscurity, exciting as little sympathy as did the other, in still more evil days, in passing to the scaffold. In all the calamities that have overtaken her, domestic as well as public, the duchess exhibited true dignity and resignation, bearing her misfortunes as becomingly as her honors; and love, admiration and respect, which accompanied her through life, follow her to the grave.

Lamartine claims that he had but to speak the word and the duchess would have been regent, and her son king of France. He had but to say: "Arise! You are the widow of the Duke of Orleans, whose death and memory the people have crowned in you! You are children bereft of their father, and adopted by the nation! You are the innocent victims of the throne, the guests and suitors of the people! You take shelter from the throne in a revolution! This revolution is just, it is generous, it is French! It does not war with women and children. It does not grasp the inheritance of widows and orphans. It does not plunder its prisoners and guests. Go and reign! It restores you from compassion to the throne which was lost by the faults of which you are only the victims. The ministers of your grandfather have injured your inheritance—the people restore it. They adopted, they will fill for you the room of your grandfather. You had but a prince for your guardian—you shall have a mother and a nation." But Lamartine did not speak the word, and the duchess with her children fled into exile.

DIAMOND DUST.

It is stated that the demand for diamond dust within five years has increased very materially, on account of the increased demand for all articles that are wrought by it, such as cameos, intaglios, etc. Recently there has been a discovery made of the peculiar power of diamond dust upon it; it gives the finest edge to all kinds of cutlery, and will doubtless displace all other substances for that purpose. It is well known that in cutting a diamond—the hardest substance in nature—the dust is placed on the teeth of the saw, to which it adheres, and thus prevents the instrument from making its way through the gem. To this dust, too, is to be attributed solely the power of art to make brilliants from rough diamonds; from the dust is obtained the perfection of the geometrical symmetry, which is one of the chief beauties of the mineral, and also that adamantine polish, which nothing can injure or affect, save a substance of its own nature.

SCION OF THE CHARTER OAK.—A gentleman in South Coventry, Conn., has on his grounds an oak tree, now eight feet in height, which he has raised from an acorn picked from the old Charter Oak seven years ago.

THE CLERGYMAN'S RAIMENT.—A calf ate a minister's shirt, recently, at Calama, Cal., with $114 in gold, which was in a pocket of the shirt. The minister gives up his shirt as "done gone," but hopes to recover his gold.

CRUEL RACE.—Two men have been running horses in a twenty-mile race at Detroit. One of the horses dropped on the last mile from sheer exhaustion, and has since died.

Foreign Miscellany.

The French Gazette Medicale says cold charcoal laid on a burn will stop the pain and heal it.

The total rateable property in Birmingham, last year, was valued at nearly £850,000.

The English marquis of Westminster has an income of sixty-seven thousand dollars a week.

The French government is boring an artesian well in Paris, which is already 1742 feet deep!

The British government are building 36 steamships to mount, in all, 1960 guns.

The Earl of Derby recently lost $300,000 at the Epsom races. He is an inveterate turfite.

There are about 30,000 blind persons in France, of whom about 5000 are children.

The French have abandoned the idea of rivaling our Southern States in cotton-raising.

The authorities of Geneva have entered a protest against the expulsion of refugees, and demand that no expulsion act shall be enforced.

A company has been formed for a submarine telegraph between England and India, via the Red Sea, capital one million sterling.

A manufacturer of pianos at Berlin, C. Malitz, has taken out a patent for a new method by which octaves are produced on the piano by striking a single key.

The condition of the river Thames is the topic of serious discussion in the British Parliament. The London Times declares it to be "the uncleanest, foulest river in the world."

The hotel of Mdlle. Rachel, in the Rue Trudon, Paris, has been sold by public auction. The upset price was 120,000*fr.*, and the sum for which it was adjudged was 220,000*fr.*, exclusive of costs.

The Pau journals announce the death, at that place, aged 84, of the Baroness Bernadotte, widow of the brother of the late King of Sweden. She leaves one son, Baron Oscar Bernadotte.

Alexander Dumas means to crown his literary career by the publication of a cookery-book, destined to eclipse every culinary book ever published.

DICKENS AND BULWER.—Both of these great novelists are living separate from their wives. Each of the two seems to be idolized by almost every lady in the world, except the one he interchanged vows with at the altar.

"Steel biscuits" are among the novelties advertised in the London newspapers. They are represented to be an elegant and very palatable preparation, and medical men pronounce them a most useful and agreeable tonic.

It is now denied that Nena Sahib is accomplished, or that he speaks French or English even tolerably. He has a steward, however, whom he sent to England and France, and who is supposed to have put him up to the revolt by incorporeal representations of British impotence.

Dr. Schwarz, in Hamburg, editor of the Handelsblatt, has published a work on the crisis of 1857, which contains, among others, a complete list of all the suspensions of payment and failures which occurred in all parts of the globe during this period.

It is said that the hiding place of Mr. Alsop, Orsini's fellow-conspirator, is known to the British government.

Two successful novelists are now members of the British Cabinet—Benj. D'Israeli and Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton.

Steps are being taken in Southampton, Eng., to erect a statue there to the memory of Dr. Isaac Watts.

Athens, Greece, is to be lighted with gas, but it has already taken three months to dig the foundation for a gasometer.

Hendrik Conscience, the well-known Flemish novelist, has been elected Professor of Flemish Literature in the University of Ghent.

The British Parliament has expelled a bankrupt member, and it is reported that there are other members to be ejected from their seats.

There are twenty universities in Germany, having about 1400 professors and teachers, and 13,000 pupils, of whom twenty per cent. are foreigners.

The ostrich has been domesticated in Algeria. Nine young ones are now in a brood. The flesh of the grown bird is expected to become eatable in its new state. The feathers and eggs are profitable.

At her majesty's last state ball, the Marquis of Westminster, the richest man in England, wore four splendid jewels, amongst which was the famous diamond valued at £30,000, in the hilt of his sword.

There has been a terrible railroad accident in Belgium (a very seldom occurrence in Europe), by which 21 were killed, and 52 wounded. The engine came in contact with two team wagons, when at its highest speed.

In the Island of Rhodes, according to recent letters, all the crops were perishing from drouth, murrain had broken out among the cattle, and extensive depredations were committed by birds of passage. The governor of the island had formed a corps of 150 practised marksmen to kill the birds.

Some unknown donor has just released the English Church at Paris from debt, by handing in a check for the whole amount—$19,000. Some people imagine this regal donation to emanate from Lord Ward; others declare that it can proceed from no hand but that of Miss Burdett Coutts.

In Leipsic there are 116 publishers' and large book-selling houses, nine type foundries, and twenty printing offices, the annual consumption of paper averaging about 15,000 bales, at 5000 sheets each bale. Two hundred years ago, the printing interest of the same place was represented by five master-printers and eleven compositors and pressmen.

At Bona, Africa, the native Algerines, angry at no rain falling, seized half a dozen marabouts, and plunged the holy men into the sea, keeping them in the bath until a shower came. It actually began to pour down at once. The Lazaroni at Naples are trying a similar experiment against the lava of Vesuvius with a wooden doll of St. Januarius.

Record of the Times.

The Moravian congregation at Bethlehem, Pa., have over a million dollars at interest.

There are said to be sixteen thousand more women than men in Philadelphia.

The Bryan Gallery collection of pictures has been removed to the Cooper Gallery, New York.

The success of the French theatrical company in New York will establish a French theatre.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania lately passed a law sanctioning a freer trade in money.

The whole number of land-warrants issued in June was 963, requiring over 142,000 acres to satisfy them.

One thousand barrels of flour are contracted for in Cincinnati, to be delivered in September, at $3 per barrel, by parties in Indiana.

A suit for slander has been commenced in New Orleans, in which Pierre Soule is counsel for plaintiff, who lays her damages at $100,000.

E. C. Goodwin, late editor of the Litchfield Enquirer, has exchanged poverty and printing for wealth and matrimony.

The Central Park in New York will progress rapidly, $300,000 having been appropriated to begin with.

Dr. Wynne, of Baltimore, has received the great Victoria gold medal for his report on the cholera of 1849.

The grapes near Cincinnati are beginning to show the mildew. Scattering powdered flour of sulphur over them is the remedy employed.

A lady the other day, visiting the White Mountains, saw and captured a young bear at Gorham. "Alone she did it."

In California they frequently devote Sunday to public amusements. At San Francisco the race course is crowded on that day.

Dr. Nettleton adopted the following as a maxim for the government of his life: "Do all the good you can in the world, and make as little noise about it as possible."

Col. John O'Fallon, a St. Louis millionaire, has signified his intention to donate $100,000 for the endowment of the O'Fallon Polytechnic School in that city.

An infant son of a clergyman named Alexander, has recovered $3333 damages from the Cleveland and Fitchburg Railroad Company, for having his hand cut off by a train of cars.

The longest straight stretch of road in the south, is on the Wilmington, Charlotte and Rutherford Railroad, where for seventy-five miles the line is perfectly straight.

Deming Jarves, of Boston, has commenced the erection of buildings for the manufacture of glass, at North Sandwich, on the site of the Monument Iron Company's Works, which were destroyed by fire last year.

A Mississippi paper tells how a fellow of doubtful character was induced to leave. Some of his neighbors made up a sufficient sum of money for him to travel on, and left it lying about loose. He found it, but supposing he had stolen it, he left—not the money, but the county.

A young sculptor, Mr. Galt, is executing a marble statue of Jefferson, for Virginia.

A speculator in lotteries lately testified that he had lost $30,000 in the purchase of tickets.

The remains of beet root, after it has been used for making sugar, are found to yield good paper.

Edward Everett has delivered his oration on Washington eighty-two times, for the Mount Vernon fund, and the receipts, with the accumulations thereon, now amount to $42,000.

At a recent sale of literary property in London, the copyright and stereotype plates of Jeremy Bentham's complete works, in eleven volumes, sold for £145.

During the year 1857 over twenty millions of passengers were carried over the city railroads of New York on the third, the fourth, the sixth, and the eighth avenues.

Hon. Robert Dale Owen, U. S. Minister at the Court of Naples, has written home to his friends in Indiana that he has become converted to Christianity. Mr. Owen has heretofore, we believe, been an infidel.

Rev. T. O. Lincoln, of Utica, was presented by the youth of his congregation (Baptist) with a pair of kid gloves—each of the fingers and thumbs of both gloves had folded in it a ten dollar bill.

Mr. Wm. B. Astor, now in Paris, has bought Powers's statue called "California," for the sum of $7500, and the Hon. Hamilton Fish has bought a third duplicate of the same artist's "Fisher Boy," for the sum of $1000.

Augustine Heard, Esq., of Boston, has presented to the First Congregational Church in Ipswich the house and land formerly occupied by the late Dr. Thomas Manning, to be used as a parsonage.

The number of emigrants who arrived at Quebec up to the 11th of June during the year 1857, was 13,225, while the number arrived up to the same date this year is only 4175—a decrease of about 9000.

The amount of copper shipped the present season from the Lake Superior region up to the last dates was 1085 tons. The shipments from the Superior region for the season are expected to reach 7000 tons more than last year.

About a year since, a young man named James Doan, at that time working as a journeyman carpenter in Chicago, received a legacy of forty thousand pounds by the death of an uncle in Australia. The New Covenant announces that he died lately from the effects of dissipation.

It is calculated that a fluent speaker utters between 7000 and 7500 words in the course of an hour's uninterrupted speaking. Many orators of more than usually rapid utterance, will reach 8000 and even 9000. But 125 words a minute, or 7500 an hour, is a fair average.

A fly lays during the summer, each time eighty eggs, making 230, of which half are supposed to be females. Now calculate the generations and it will be found that in one summer a single fly produces over two millions. Let alone birds and toads and everything else that are continually eating these pests.

Merry-Making.

"Mind your eye," as the thread said to the needle.

A man down East advertises a cordial preparation from woman's kisses.

If you'd learn to bow, watch a mean man when he talks to a gentleman of wealth.

The speaker who was "drawn out," measured eighteen inches more than he did before.

If the doctor orders bark, has not the patient a right to growl?

What is that which, when brought to table, is cut, but never tasted? Cards.

The anxiety that a man feels for the want of funds is called capital punishment.

"A penny for your thoughts," as the cheap newspaper reader said to the editor of a daily.

The musician who composed the "march of intellect" is engaged on a new opera.

A drop in the eye causes blindness, and a drop in the head puts out the eyes of the understanding.

In what part of London should Rarey reside? In Horse-ly-down, surely, the other replied.

In Mexico, everybody is supposed to be an ex-president who wears a clean shirt and keeps his hands washed.

A vocalist says he could sing "way down on the old Tar River," if he could only get the pitch.

Contradicted—The report that a Yankee had invented a machine to take the noise out of thunder.

Why is a reporter like a pickpocket? Because he takes notes, and must have quick fingers to ensure success.

A minister prayed fervently for those of his congregation who were too proud to kneel and too lazy to stand.

Attend to your own business, and never trust it to another. "A pot that belongs to many, is ill stirred and worse boiled."

Ladies of a certain age may perhaps envy the Emperor of China one of his luxuries; his birthday is celebrated only once in ten years.

A young carpenter, having been told that the course of true love never did run smooth, resolved on going to court his young lady with a fore plane under his arm.

A late Dublin paper contains the following advertisement: "To Let—The upper part of a cellar—to a small family, rent low. P. S. Privilege on the sidewalk for a pig."

The convivial Charles the Bold, being seated at a dinner table opposite the learned Scotus, asked him jeeringly what was the difference between Scot and sot. "They are only divided by the table," was the reply.

"Well, I suppose you have been out to look at Texas; did you see anything of our old friend—out there?" "Yes, gone deranged." "Gone deranged! how? what does he do? real crazy?" "Yes, indeed; he doesn't know his own hogs from his neighbor's."

Why are a young lady's affections always doubtful? Because they are mis-givings.

Betting is immoral; but how can the man who bets be worse than the one who is no better?

Why are persons with short memories like office-holders? Because they are always forgetting everything.

"I'm particularly uneasy on this point," as the fly said when the young gentleman stuck him on the end of a needle.

Why do young people go to a confirmation always in new clothes? Because they do not wish to be confirmed in their old habits.

Why are "colored gemmen" merchants, and friendly to home protection? Because they deal in ebony and ivory, and wear their own wool.

Why should our merchant tailors form themselves into a regiment of heavy dragoons? Because they are splendid fellows for charging.

Of all the arrows shot at our miserable nature, is there one that is not made keener if whetted on the poor man's hearth?

Tiger hunting is very fine amusement, so long as we hunt the tiger; but it is rather awkward when the tiger takes it into his head to hunt us.

"Mynheer, do you know what for we call our boy Hans?" "I do not, really." "Well, I will tell you. Der reason we call our boy Hans, it ish his name."

"Here's Webster on a bridge," said Mrs. Partington, as she handed Ike the dictionary. "Study it contentively, and you will gain a great deal of inflammation."

"I say, friend, your horse is a little contrary, is he not?" "No sir-ee!" "What makes him stop, then?" "O, he's afraid somebody'll say 'whoa!' and he sha'n't hear it."

A dish for epicures was presented at a dinner-table in Philadelphia, a few days since—eggs fried in butter, with their shells on. The dish was invented by a young lady from Ireland, who said she could "do that and a dale besides."

A contemporary, noticing the appointment of a friend as postmaster, says: "If he attends to the mails as well as he does to the females, he will make a very attentive and efficient officer."

A correspondent of a New York paper writes that while travelling at the South, he attended a negro meeting, where the sable preacher offered an earnest prayer for "de white element in our population."

A lady asked Dr. Staats if he did not think the small bonnets the ladies wore had a tendency to produce congestion of the brain. "O, no," replied the doctor; "ladies who have brains don't wear them."

"Husband, why do you destroy all my sweet Williams in the garden, and leave all the bouncing Betsies?" "Because the Betsies are all favorites of mine, and I wont have any sweet Williams about my premises."

☞ GIVEN AWAY. ☞

Any person desiring to see a copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, the favorite illustrated weekly journal, has only to address us a line to that effect and a copy will be sent by return of mail, full of elegant engravings, free of charge. M. M. BALLOU, Boston, Mass.

COMIC SKETCHES.

From the Stage Box of Comedy and Farce.

Spriggins's feelings are overcome entirely by Mrs. Barrows acting in The Lady of Lyons;

But as entirely recovered by the astonishing comicalities of Wood in The Lottery Ticket.

Mrs. Jawbeater, who does not see why that exceedingly improper play, Camille, can be allowed;

Yet is delighted by The Serious Family, although a member of the church.

Young Bob quite appreciates the clowning of Gabriel Ravel;

But sees a horrid example in his fate when he goes down through the stage with a clang like copper.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

The poet of the "Lillville Banner" trying to suppress his feelings when Mrs. Skerret recites her wrongs to a full house;

And violently applauding Warren's attempt at comfort, when he offers her a drink from his bottle of whiskey.

The country schoolmarm's disgust at that young Davenport's peculiar way of kissing a lady before all the people.

Her virtue not alarmed, however, when John Gilbert does the same thing in the character of papa.

Gripes the money lender watching the career of a fashionable rascal—and

His satisfaction at the close of the play at seeing the swindler led off to prison, while everybody gets their rights.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. VIII.—No. 4.

BOSTON, OCTOBER, 1858.

WHOLE No. 46.

MASSACHUSETTS SCENERY.

MOUNT TOM, FROM THE HORSE-FERRY ON CONNECTICUT RIVER.

In the present article we propose to devote pen and pencil to the illustration of some of the striking features of the scenery of the State of Massachusetts. This State abounds in subjects for pencillings and "inklings," from its irregular and indented seacoast on the east, to its borders on the west, embracing a wonderful variety of natural characteristics. It is true that our landscape does not rise to the highest level of the grand and sublime, in any locality. Yet all beneath that, within the range of the impressive, the romantic, the pastoral, it certainly contains. For the Switzerland of America we must look farther north. To find the majesty of falling waters we must go to Niagara; still we will match our beautiful Merrimac or our Connecticut against any rivers of the north, and there is many a sweet valley, nestling in the hollows of the hills, nameless and almost unknown, save to its tenants, that we would match against similar retreats with sounding names that have been sung in verse and recited in story.

Until within a few years, some of the finest scenery of Massachusetts was inaccessible to the many. The old stage-coaches, travelling on various routes, could convey but a limited number compared to the multitude transported daily by the railroad cars. In the match of horseflesh against iron the former is beaten out and out. Yet if travelling by stage-coach was confined to few persons, those few, under favorable circumstances, enjoyed it immensely. Our most satisfactory studies of Massachusetts scenery have been made from the driver's box of a stage-coach on fine autumnal mornings. The vehicle, with its uniform ten miles an hour, moved quite fast enough to permit the eye to take cognizance of objects in the foreground and in the middle distance, and then, as your progression was not mechanical, the driver would pull up in some romantic spot and permit you to take a long gaze at a bright sheet of falling water, or a peep into some sylvan glen. No such advantages are presented by the railroad cars. Nothing arrests their momentum. They are pitiless as fate. On—on—they fly like the wandering Jew, and if the steam-horse had a bit of poetry in his iron noddle he would snort forth in the words of Beranger:

FERRY-BOAT.

"Ever, ever
Whirls the earth o'er which I fly—
Ever—ever—ever—ever!"

To gaze upon scenery as you are tearing along at thirty or forty miles an hour is about as satisfactory as it would be to try to take account of the figures of a kaleidoscope driven by a high-pressure steam-engine. It is confusing, and rather tends to produce insanity to see fences flying back and trees running forward, and hills dancing country dances and bobbing up and down with the motion of the cars, which, by an optical delusion imparts itself to all the surroundings. You hear about some gray old mountain, thunder-scarred and venerable, seated on an adamantine base, the type of changeless grandeur, and you look out for it with a degree of expectant reverence; but it gives a severe shock to your feelings to behold that respectable eminence going through the figures of a country dance, as if it was a thoughtless young hill, and rushing away at top speed like a cowardly Titan soundly threshed in a battle of the giants and scouring off in a panic saute qui pent. From the deck of a slow-going Rhine steamer you may take in all the characteristic features of that lordly stream; the panorama moves moderately enough to enable you to daguerreotype vine-clad crag, and purple mountain, and feudal tower on your memory. But we defy you to make any such record in a railroad car. Yet let us not undervalue the railroad. It has thrown open to hundreds of thousands the glories of nature. It carries people who would never otherwise have seen them within reach of the most glorious, the most elevating scenery in the world. At morning you eat your breakfast in Boston; at night you gaze on the White Mountains, "pointing their bold outlines on the evening sky." Swiftly and cheaply the flying car carries you whither you please, but arrived at a place of interest, the scenery-seeker must leave it. Let him then mount a horse and pursue his search and study of the picturesque in the saddle. There is no mode of locomotion so exhilarating as this; yet perhaps the care of your horse may divert your mind too much from the study of the landscape.

Your true lover of nature is best satisfied, after all, to take his knapsack on his back, his staff in his hand, and perform his pilgrimage on foot. You are then unconfined to the highway—you can follow winding lanes and seductive glens; you can ford brooks, climb hillsides, plunge into valleys, repose under branching oaks; in a word, you are master of your own time and movements, untrammelled by any regulations save those of your own will. Hazlitt is decidedly in favor of this mode, but according to his opinion, the pedestrian should make his tour alone, in which we do not agree with him. He says:

"One of the pleasantest things in the world is a journey; but I like to go by myself. I can enjoy society in a room; but out of doors, nature is company enough for me. I am then never less alone than when alone.

'The fields his study, nature was his book.'

I cannot see the wit of walking and talking at the same time. When I am in the country, I wish to vegetate like the country. I am not for criticising hedge-rows and black cattle. I go out of town in order to forget the town and all that is in it. There are those who for this purpose go to watering-places, and carry the metropolis with them. I like more elbow room, and fewer incumbrances. I like solitude, when I give myself up to it, for the sake of solitude; nor do I ask for 'a friend in my retreat,

Whom I may whisper solitude is sweet.'

The soul of a journey is liberty, perfect liberty, to think, feel, do just as one pleases. We go a journey chiefly to be free of all impediments and of all inconveniences; to leave ourselves behind, much more to get rid of others. It is because I want a little breathing-space to muse on indifferent matters, where Contemplation

'May plume her feathers and let grow her wings,
That in the various bustle of resort
Were all too ruffled, and sometimes impaired.'

that I absent myself from the town for a while, without feeling at a loss the moment I am left by myself. Instead of a friend in a post-chaise, or in a tilbury, to exchange good things with, and vary the same stale topics over again, for once let me have a truce with imperinence. Give me the clear blue sky over my head, and the green turf beneath my feet, a winding road before me, and a three hour's march to dinner—and then to thinking! It is hard if I cannot start some game on these lone heaths. I laugh, I run, I leap, I sing for joy. From the point of yonder rolling cloud, I plunge into my past being, and revel there, as the sunburnt Indian plunges headlong into the wave that wafts him to his native shore. Then long-forgotten things, like 'sunken wrack and sumless treasures,' burst upon my eager sight, and I begin to feel, think, and be myself again. Instead of an awkward silence, broken by attempts at wit or dull common places, mine is that undisturbed silence of the heart which alone is perfect eloquence. No one likes puns, alliterations, antitheses, argument, and analysis better than I do ; but I sometimes had rather be without them. 'Leave, O leave me to my repose!' I have just now other business in hand, which would seem idle to you, but is with me 'very stuff of the conscience.' Is not this wild and let it serve me to brood over, from here to yonder craggy point, and from thence onward to the far-distant horizon? I should be but bad company all that way and therefore prefer being alone."

A STREET IN HADLEY.

SCHELBURN FALLS.

rose sweet without a comment? Does not this daisy leap to my heart set in its coat of emerald? Yet if I were to explain to you the circumstance that has so endeared it to me, you would only smile. Had I not better then keep it to myself,

And Rousseau says, in one of the most eloquent passages of his "confessions:—" "Never did I possess such activity of thought, never was I so sensible of my being, so full of the enjoyment of life, so much myself, if I may dare use the expression, as when I travelled alone and on foot. There is something in walking which animates and enlivenes my ideas; while I remain still, I am scarce capable of thought; my body must be set in motion if I would rouse my intellect. My gaze upon the country, the succession of pleasing views, the open air, my keen appetite, the flow of health which walking earns for me, the ease of a country inn, my distance from all that can make awhile, I take pleasure in describing them to myself, what boldness of pencil, what freshness of color, what energy of expression do I give them! This is all to be found, they tell me, in my works, though written towards the decline of life. O! if they had seen those of my early youth, those which I made during my walks, those which I composed, but which I never wrote!

But waiving the question of how to see, let us glance at what is to be seen in Massachusetts. To us there is a wealth of beauty within our own borders, which only involves us in what the French term the "embarrassment of riches." Are you for the sea-shore? You are hard to please if you cannot find food for admiration along the countless beaches and headlands, the stern promontories and deep bays of the seaboard, from Cape Ann to Cape Cod. If you seek higher emotions, thrilling associations, a stimulus to patriotism—is there not Plymouth Rock? "No New Englander," says Dr. Dwight, "who is willing to indulge in his native feelings, can stand upon the rock where our ancestors set the first foot upon their arrival on the American shore, without experiencing emotions very different from those which are excited by any common object of the same nature. No New Englander could be willing to have that rock buried and forgotten. Let him reason as much, as coldly, as ingeniously as he pleases, he will still regard that spot with emotions wholly different from those which are exhibited by places of equal and even superior importance." And the Frenchman, De Tocqueville, in his celebrated work on this country, makes the following beautiful comment on Plymouth Rock. "This rock," he says, "has become an object of veneration in the United States. I have seen bits of it carefully preserved in several towns of the Union. Does not this show that all human power and greatness is in the soul of man? Here is a stone which the feet of a few outcasts pressed for an instant; and the stone became famous; it is treasured by a great nation; its very dust is sacred as a relic. And what becomes of the gateways of me feel my dependence, from all that reminds me of my situation, all this disentangles my soul, gives me a daring grasp of thought, throws me, as it were, into the immensity of created things, where I combine, select, appropriate them to myself, without restraint and without fear. The whole of Nature is at my control; my heart, wandering from object to object, unites, identifies itself to those which are congenial to it, is surrounded by enchanting illusions, is intoxicated with delicious sentiments. If, to fix them for a thousand palaces? who cares for them?"

ROADSIDE CASCADE, SHELburne.

But setting aside historical associations, the intrinsic beauty of the sea-shore, the hills, the woods and the rivers of Massachusetts commend them to every lover of nature. Let us proceed to cite a few examples selected from the western part of the State. Our first view represents Mount Tom, as seen from the horse-ferry on the Connecticut River. The ferry-boat, as another engraving shows, is propelled by horses. It does not run at stated times; but whenever a carriage wishes to cross, and the boat is on the other side of the river, a blast from a tin horn (it ought to be a bugle) summons the ferryman to come and get you. On the passage across the river, you have a fine view of Mount Tom, as shown in our first engraving. This mountain is in the town of East Hampton, and is separated from Mount Holyoke by a narrow cleft or notch, as shown in our next engraving. Mount Tom is 1200 feet high, and rises in rugged majesty, the sole object in the landscape, which frowns eternal defiance on the march of human improvement. It has been remarked that "even here, if the not improbable theory of some geologists be correct, the modifying hand of nature has accomplished one of its most remarkable achievements in the excavation of a rocky channel for the Connecticut, between these two mountain heights, which are supposed originally to have formed a connected chain, at a considerable elevation above their present bases. The appearance of the bold cliffs at the Rock Ferry crossing, as well as the form of the vast alluvial basin which would be embraced within the sweep of this mountain range, if only a connection here were formed, together with other geological characteristics, render this theory, extraordinary as it may seem, almost a matter of obvious demonstration." There are few mountain scenes accessible as these, and all persons who desire to form an acquaintance with the romance of nature ought to visit them. The variety of the views they present, the mixture of wildness and cultivation, and the extent of landscape commanded from their summits, amply repay the expense and toil of a visit to Mount Tom and Mount Holyoke.

NATURAL BRIDGE, NORTH ADAMS.

After returning from Northampton, we may make a visit to Hadley, a street in which forms the subject of our next engraving. It is a handsome town on the east bank of the Connecticut River, united to Northampton by a fine bridge 1080 feet in length. The village covers a sort of peninsula formed by a bend in the river. The principal street is about a mile in length, and presents the usual features of a New England village. It is wide, and shaded by noble elms. Its Indian name was Nornottock. It stands in the midst of a fine agricultural region, and the annual overflow of the river renders its meadows remarkably productive. It is eighty-eight miles southwest from Boston. The village consists of two principal streets, running parallel with each other, and crossed at right angles by smaller ones. Our engraving shows the most westerly of these, and the view is taken nearly at the upper end. The first building is the town-house, the next the Congregational meeting-house.

After leaving Hadley, and passing up the river to Greenfield, we take the road from that town to North Adams, in Berkshire County. The scenery on the road between Greenfield and Shelburne Falls is quite diversified, and abounds in beautiful cascades, one of the most striking of which is depicted in one of our engravings. The village of Shelburne Falls is upon the western border of the town of Shelburne, and the eastern of Buckland, lying upon both sides of Deerfield River, which falls forty-seven feet in a few rods, and affords a fine water-power, which is well improved. The building on the right belongs to the Shelburne Falls Cutlery Works. Until 1768, Shelburne formed a part of Deerfield, and was called Shelburne Northwest. At its incorporation it was named for Lord Shelburne. The village of Shelburne Falls is neat, handsome, and surrounded by charming scenery. It contains a well-endowed and flourishing academy; population, 1239. Our fifth engraving represents a picturesque cascade in Shelburne. After leaving this village, our road passes along the banks of the Deerfield River, one of the most romantic and beautiful streams in New England. The hills rise so abruptly from the banks of the river, that there is barely room for the carriage way, which of necessity follows all the turns of the river as it meanders between the hills, giving glimpses of the most enchanting landscape. We now come to the town of Charlemont, in Franklin County. This was formerly a frontier town, and the scene of many bloody encounters with the Indians; there are yet traces of the old colonial garrisons. The scenery is bold and romantic. The town is rough and craggy, but contains a good deal of valuable land. Passing Charlemont, we leave the Deerfield River, not without regret.

We now ascend the Florida Mountain, which comprises the town of Florida. Florida comprises a part of Zoar, an unincorporated district. The town is situated on the height of the Green Mountain range; its climate is severe, and its surface rugged. Hoosac Mountain is 1448 feet above Deerfield River, which washes its eastern boundary. Here is the locality of the famous Hoosac Tunnel, which, when completed, will permit the passage of railway trains through the bowels of the mountain. The ascent is very great, and on reaching the highest part of Florida, the town of North Adams is only distant one mile in a direct line, but owing to the steepness of the descent, the road is obliged to wind in a zigzag course, making the actual distance travelled little short of four miles.

The natural bridge over Hudson's Brook, faithfully depicted in our sixth engraving, is a curiosity well worthy of a visit. The waters of this brook have worn a fissure from thirty to sixty feet in depth, and about five hundred feet in length, through a solid mass of white marble rock, and formed a natural bridge of that material fifty feet above the bed of the stream. Our view is taken from below the bridge. The descent is dangerous, owing to the slippery state of the almost perpendicular rock. Large chambers are worn in the side of the rock by the action of water upon small stones which have lodged in cavities, and which gives them a rotary motion the crest of the huge wave that defies and rests immovable upon its mighty base. "These mighty works of nature," says an English writer, "speak aloud of Omnipotence. Nor is it one mountain's height alone, but where they 'each on others throng,' together with their grand accompaniments, which affect the mind so intensely—the fearful precipices, the overhanging rocks, now dimly seen through a passing vapor, or hidden for a while behind some sweeping cloud. The soul is bowed down before them, and our imaginations are carried back, ay, even to a date beyond the creation of man!" Mountain scenery always possessed a powerful charm for the eloquent Rousseau. He says, somewhere, "Never did a level country, however beautiful it might be, seem beautiful to me. I must have cataracts, rocks, fir trees, dark forests, steep and rugged pathways, with precipices at my feet, to make when the stream is full. In summer the water is quite low, and has the appearance shown in our view; but in spring it nearly fills the cavity to the brim, and even in summer it sometimes rises suddenly several feet, the bed of the stream being very narrow and easily acted upon by rain upon the mountain, where it takes its rise.

SADDLE MOUNTAIN, FROM WILLIAMSTOWN ROAD.

Our seventh engraving is an accurate representation of Saddle Mountain, the most elevated place in Massachusetts. The view is taken from the Williamstown road. The mountain rises 3580 feet above tide-water at Albany. The most elevated peak on the left is called Greylock, the other, Saddle Ball, and the depression between is the Notch. The mountain derives its name from the accurate likeness of a saddle which its topography presents. Climbing to the highest peak, the tourist finds his toils amply repaid by the bold scenery with which he is surrounded. He can now understand the enthusiasm of the mountaineer for his native land, as he stands on me shudder." This reminds us of Burke's assertion, that terror was the ruling passion and common stock of everything sublime. Mountains seemed formed for the dwelling place of freemen. Centuries ago the gallant Switzers threw off the yoke of Austria, and the Alps, in the heart of king-ridden and priest-ridden Europe, are still free. The first Circassians still maintain their independence in defiance of the gigantic power of the czar; and were liberty to be driven from all the lowlands of the earth, she would still stand at bay in the mountains. On the mountain tops our souls seem nearer to heaven, and every trivial or unholy thought is swept from the mind on these high places. It is from these lofty stand-points alone, that we can obtain just views of the grandeur of creation—that we can realize how utterly insignificant are the works of man when brought into comparison with the handiwork of God. The mountaineer, no more than the astronomer, can be undevout.

THE MAMMOTH CAVE, KENTUCKY.

ENTRANCE OF GOTHIC AVENUE.

North America, the primitive country in which nature assumes forms that belong at once to the sublime and the impossible, had no marvel which could be compared to the cataract of Niagara till 1820, when some miners, who were employed in extracting saltpetre from one of the numerous caverns in the State of Kentucky, lost their way in the midst of its then unexplored meanderings, and remained thus separated from the world, buried far from the light of day, and sequestered from the rest of living beings for the space of seventy hours. Thanks to the search of their comrades, these unfortunate persons were found; and, once recovered from the terror this terrible interment had occasioned, described the astonishing discoveries they had made during their sojourn in the bowels of the rock, and stimulated the desire of their auditors to explore with them the interior of the cavern, provided with an Ariadne's thread, by means of which they escaped the troubles and terrors of an unknown research. To these hardy pioneers in the subterranean regions of the Mammoth Cave, we are indebted for a knowledge of this peerless marvel. The Mammoth Cave is situated in Edmonson county, Kentucky, about 90 miles southwest from Nashville, not far from the banks of Green River, on which steamboats are constantly plying, and land passengers a few hundred feet from their place of destination. The country in the midst of which the entrance to the cavern is found, is traversed by a range of gray, bald, calcareous rocks, which suddenly sink into a valley filled with oaks, nut trees and elms, as regularly ranged as if planted by the hand of man. Here you find a splendid hotel, furnished with taste, and excellently kept, where the traveller, in going or returning from his expedition, is sure to find comfort and elegance. The opening of the cavern is at two hundred paces from the hotel, at the extremity of a glen shaded by pines and larches, interlaced with the tendrils of the wild vine and flexible convolvulus. There rise heaps of ashes on the right; at the turn of a rock, a current of fresh air announces that the opening is before you, dark and silent as the cave of Delphos, though it utter no oracular warnings. A rivulet runs noiselessly at the base of a hundred steps, hewn in the rock by the hand of man, and its waters disappear in an abyss dug by the Great Architect of the world. Then begins for travellers that series of emotions which will continue for three days and nights, if they choose to remain that length of time in the cavern. The three guides who are to direct their steps through the subterranean labyrinth, light and distribute their resinous torches. The first place to which they conduct you is the hall, where, in 1823, the miners discovered the skeleton of a giant, who must have been a remarkable person when in the flesh, for his bones measured eight and a half feet long. They remained for a long time exposed, but at last the superstitious fears of the workmen induced their foreman to bury these curious relics, which time has now reduced to dust. A few paces further, you perceive a worm-eaten, but still solid door, which, turning on its hinges, gives passage to so strong a current of air that the torches are immediately extinguished; this is the true opening of the cave. We cannot in this article attempt to follow the guide and those he precedes through the multiplied windings of the Mammoth Cave, as the details of the journey would fill an entire volume, and we must confine ourselves principally to those scenes we have selected for pictorial illustration. It is enough to state that this subterranean region, which the hand of man has never sought to change or modify, which presents itself to tourists with the virgin purity of a flower half-opened to the freshness of the breeze, contains 226 passages, 47 chambers or halls, 8 waterfalls, and 23 rivers or lakes. You pass through walls of polished stone to Audubon Avenue, at the end of which is a crystal well, 25 feet deep. On the right is the Bat's Chamber, where these winged rats take refuge in winter. The Great Gallery is a vast tunnel which leads to the Kentucky Cliffs. Descending thence, you find yourself in a vast hall, like the interior of a cathedral in appearance, capable of holding five thousand persons. A single torch is enough to illuminate the whole interior; for the flame, striking the points of the stalagmites and stalactites, is reflected and multiplied by the diamond faces of the crystal, till the whole scene is dazzling in splendor. An inexhaustible saltpetre mine is found in the neighborhood of this chapel. Gothic Avenue, so named from its resemblance to the architecture of the Middle Ages, strikes the eye by its grandeur of arrangement. There, five years ago, were found two mummies, wrapped in deer-skins, tattooed and painted white. One of them, belonging to the feminine sex, was of lofty stature and elegantly formed. An examination of the objects found near these human remains, such as four pair of mocassins, two sacks of different sizes, five ornaments for the head made of high-colored feathers, seven bone needles, whistles, and a variety of household utensils, proved that the skeletons deposited here belonged to the Indian race. One of them was placed in the Cincinnati Museum, and destroyed by fire with the rest of that collection, and the other is still to be seen in the British Museum. The Hall of Stalagmites is one of the most remarkable monuments of the Mammoth Cave. The imagination cannot form an idea of the beauties which nature has created three hundred feet below the surface of the earth. Heaps of diamonds, brilliant pearls, resplendent emeralds (seemingly), all the marvels of a jeweller's workshop, are encrusted in the ceiling, the walls, and the slender columns of this hall. On seeing this regularly ranged and uniform stalactites, one might fancy himself beneath the roof of Notre Dame, when it had just come from the hands of the architect. Further on, the guide makes you take a seat in the "Devil's Chair," at the top of a massive column. Afterwards you visit "Napoleon's Fortresses," the "Elephant's Head," the deep abyss called the "Lover's Leap," the "Crystal Pillar," the "Salt Cave," and a beautiful cascade, whose waters are lost in a bottomless well. From the Great Gallery, the visitor enters the "Ball-Room," a vast dome of elliptical form, in the centre of which rises a rotunda with colonnades, which nature seems to have formed to contain an orchestra. At the right is the "Great Sepulchre," a monumental rock resembling a sarcophagus. The "Sick Rooms" are so called from their curative properties in pulmonary complaints. Sometimes fifteen or twenty patients are assembled here. Nurses and a physician live with them, and minister to their wants. The Star Chamber offers to the eye a most wonderful optical effect; the ceiling, very lofty at this place, seems starred with all the diamonds of heaven, and when the flame of the torches irradiates their crystal faces, the eyes close involuntarily before their incandescent splendors. At the foot of the "cataract," a vast sheet of water lost in a terrific yawning gulf, the tourist commonly rests and eats his dinner. The Bottomless Well is of a horseshoe form, in the midst of which a rocky point juts out; the guide here lights pieces of paper and throws them down the abyss, but they are soon lost to the eye in the obscure and terrific depths of the chasm. The Dead Sea is a sheet of water which seems to have no current. Here the guide catches a number of small fish, the peculiarity of which is that they have no eyes. Boats tied to the shore, and holding four persons each, allow adventurers to embark on this infernal lake. You fancy, as you look at them, that mythology is no fable, and that you see Charon ferrying over the Styx the passengers who have paid him the indispensable obolus. To the right, on a cornice which extends above the Dead Sea, the glare of torches imparts a lurid effect to this thoroughly Satanic scene. Another scene of interest is the "Holy Sepulchre," a perfect imitation of the tomb of Christ in Judea. There the stalactites have assumed the form of long draperies, arranged with elegance, while from the roof depend natural chandeliers like the lamps suspended in the Holy Chapel. Cleveland's Cabinet is another splendid hall in this noted cave, a perfect arch of about fifty feet span, of an average height of ten feet, extending in a direct line at least a mile and a half, the whole of this long ceiling glittering like diamonds in the light.

THE BOTTOMLESS PIT.

THE DEAD SEA.

Such is a rapid sketch of some of the one thousand wonders of the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. It contains no reptiles or noxious animals, and the air is so pure that no decomposition or putrefaction of bodies ever takes place, and a fire is always kept up there. The temperature is equal the whole year round—the mercury, winter and summer, indicating fifty-nine degrees Fahrenheit. Our engravings of the entrance to Gothic Avenue, the Bottomless Pit, the Dead Sea, the Hall of Stalagmites, and the Star Chamber, may be relied upon for accuracy.

It is only within a few years that this cave has been very extensively explored; and it is still supposed that but a small part of it, in comparison with the whole, has ever been trodden by the foot of man. It has been estimated that the length of all the different avenues and branches, when added together, would make more than 600 miles. The darkness, deeper than that of the blackest midnight, which pervades these subterranean recesses, and which is little more than rendered visible by the torches which the visitors carry with them, renders it difficult for the spectator to form anything like an adequate idea of its vast dimensions, its great heights and depths in the different apartments, and of the singularity and beauty of the natural decorations they contain. The recent attempt of an adventurous artist, however, to obtain drawings of a number of the different avenues, halls, and chambers, for the purpose of illustrating the hidden wonders of this natural phenomenon to the eye by the aid of the beautiful illusion of the moving panorama, has been, in a great degree, successful. The different parts of the cave selected for this purpose were illuminated by hundreds of lights, placed at different points, so as to give the most powerful and just effect to the ever-varying perspective within.

Immediately upon entering the mouth of the cave, the visitor perceives a sensible change in the temperature of the atmosphere. Visitors going in and out are not liable to contract colds; but, on the contrary, colds are commonly relieved by a visit to the cave.

The cave is inhabited by two species of rats and a species of crickets, neither of which partakes of the peculiarity of the fishes—of the want of eyes,—for in both of these animals that organ is very largely developed. These rats are white and very large. Professor Agassiz has some specimens of them in the collection at Cambridge. In the winter, millions of bats find here a resting-place well suited to their wants.

During the last war with England, a saltpetre manufactory was established in this cave; and, although it was discontinued in 1815, wheel tracks are still to be seen as clear and distinct as if made yesterday. The guides also point out corn-cobs which were brought into the cave at that time, and which are perfectly fresh and sound.

The waters of the cave are of the purest kind; and, besides the springs and streams of fresh water, there are one or two sulphur springs. There are streams, lakes and waterfalls of sufficient width and depth to compare well with those of the world above ground. Some of these rivers, as they are called, are navigated by boats of sufficient size to carry twelve persons; and one of them, called the Echo, is said to be broad and deep enough, at all times, to float the largest steamers. The rivers of the Mammoth Cave were never crossed till 1840. Some of them flow in deep channels, the sides of which rise high above their ordinary level. After heavy rains, they are sometimes swollen so as to rise more than fifty feet. At such times the streams, and especially the cataracts, of the cave, exhibit a most terrific appearance. Great exertions have been made to discover the sources of these streams, and where they find their outlets; yet they still remain, in this respect, as much a mystery as ever.

"Darkly thou glidest onward, Thou deep and hidden wave!"

The laughing sunshine hath not looked Into thy hidden cave."

The different apartments and passages of this wonderful subterranean labyrinth have many of them received names, from their resemblance, more or less real, to the most celebrated interiors and decorations of architectural design. A few only can be here described.

The air of the cave, as you enter, gives a pleasant sensation of refreshing coolness. As you continue descending some irregular stone steps, the daylight fades and the gloom deepens. Nothing is heard save your own footsteps, and the sound of the waters leaping from a precipice over your head, and falling on the rocks below. A beautiful stream of water falls over the mouth of the cave, as one writer has remarked, as if it were the remnant of a graceful curtain, which had formerly concealed this wonder from the gaze of man. Looking back towards the orifice, the light of the external day appears dim, as if it were the twilight of evening. Looking before you, if looking it may be called, what a world of darkness! With all your torches how little can be seen! A strange sensation comes over you, as with hesitating step you proceed.

The first great expansion of the cavern which you enter is the Great Vestibule, an immense hall, covering an area of an acre and a half, with a dome, lost in the darkness, 100 feet high, unsupported by a single pillar. By kindling a fire at this spot, the vast dimensions of the chamber may be faintly discovered. "Far up above your head," says one, "is seen the gray ceiling rolling dimly away like a cloud, and many buttresses bending under their weight begin to project their enormous masses from their shadowy wall."

A good road extends through the entire length of Gothic Avenue, and so pleasant is the tempe-

HALL OF STALAGMITES.

nature, purity and salubrity of its atmosphere, that it has been selected as a most desirable promenade for invalids, who have sometimes resorted to this cave for their health. In one of the recesses of this avenue were to be seen, as late as 1813, two mummies in a good state of preservation, one of which was a female, in a sitting posture, with arms folded, and having before her various articles of her wardrobe. When or by whom these remains were placed in this dark and silent sepulchre, is of course unknown. A little farther on in this direction, are the Registry Rooms, the ceiling of which, being perfectly white and smooth, serves as the register of the cave. Thousands of names have been traced upon it with the smoke of the torches. Next is the Gothic Chapel, a hall of almost overwhelming grandeur, elliptical in form, and 80 feet long follow the spectator, like the sky in passing from place to place on the earth. In comparison with this dome of nature's rearing, the most celebrated of human structures sink into insignificance. There are, however, other domes in this wonderful cave, which, for height and extent, are even more extraordinary than this. Such is that, especially, which is called the Mammoth Dome. This dome of domes is nearly 400 feet above the floor of the room which it covers. Its elevation has been carefully determined by a competent civil engineer.

Cleveland's Cabinet, which we have noticed before, is a singularly beautiful display of subterranean wonder. The base of the whole is carbonate of lime, in part of a dazzling whiteness and perfectly smooth, and in part crystallized, so as to glitter like diamonds in the light. Growing by 50 in width. Immense stalagmites have been formed at each end, which almost close the entrance. There are also two rows of smaller pillars, extending from the ceiling on each side of the wall through its entire length. These impart to it, when strongly lighted up, the grand and solemn effect of a Gothic cathedral. Near this place is Brewer's Studio, a small room to which this name has recently been given by Mr. Brewer, author of the celebrated Panorama of the Mammoth Cave, from whose descriptions many of these notices have been compiled. He finished many of his sketches in this room.

THE STAR CHAMBER.

The Chief City, or Temple, is formed by an immense dome, which rises 120 feet high, and covers an area of two acres. It exceeds in size the Cave of Staffa, and rivals the celebrated vault in the Grotto of Antiparos. In passing through it from side to side, the dome appears to from this, in endlessly diversified forms, is a substance resembling selenite, translucent and imperfectly laminated. Some of the crystals bear a striking resemblance to branches of celery; others, a foot or more in length, have the color and appearance of vanilla cream candy; others are set in sulphate of lime in the form of a rose; and others roll out from the base in forms resembling the ornaments on the capital of a Corinthian column. Some of the encrustations are massive and splendid, others are as delicate as the lily, or as fancy-work of shell or wax. Think of traversing an arched way like this for a mile and a half; and all the wonders of the tales of youth—Arabian Nights, and all—seem tame, compared with the living, growing reality. Indeed, the most imaginative poet never conceived or painted a palace of such exquisite beauty or loveliness as Cleveland's Cabinet.

THE OLD OAK.

BY MINNIE MORTON.

The sky was clear, the breezes mild,
With glittering gems each spear was piled,
As, bending down each tiny blade,
Into the forest dim I strayed,
And wandered on in fancy's mood,
Till at a giant oak I stood.

Then recollection glided back,
Swiftly retracing old Time's track,
Till many years it had passed o'er,
Back to the pleasant days of yore,
When to this giant oak I strayed,
In times long past—a happy maid.

I gathered violets, white and blue,
Plenteous sprigs of meadow rue,
The tall anemone, flower of May,
Many a blossom from the spray;
I wove within my golden hair,
Blossoms and leaves both fresh and fair.

With happy hopes raised high and wild,
I then appeared a merry child,
Entrapping sunbeams on my way,
Joyfully holding them all day,
Careless and laughing, full of glee,
To every one seemed glad and free.

But still I had my pensive moods,
Within those dark and old oak woods;
I often mused on what might be
The fate God held in store for me;
Whether good or whether evil,
It yet remained for time to tell.

Time speeds his course; he flies apace;
More than five years have marked their space;
Again beneath that oak I stand,
Clasped in another's is my hand;
The autumn sun, from sky of blue,
The colored leaves shine gently through.

Weeks have passed; at the altar stand
Kind friends, collected in a band;
Happy looks from bright eyes beaming,
While around us friends are blessing;
"Those whom God has joined together, Let no person put asunder."

The scene is changed; months, years sped on,
With autumn's wail and summer's sun
Thrice has the snow been on the hills,
Thrice have been filled the gushing rills;
Towards my favorite tree I go,
Filled with sorrow, gloom and woe.

Dark, angry clouds spread o'er the sky,
Hiding the sun from mortal eye,
Flashes of vivid lightning dart,
Rending the sullen clouds apart,
While far and wide the thunders roll,
Spreading the sound from pole to pole.

Just so my heart by sorrow broke,
Flashes of angry wrath outspoke
Against the Ruler of the storm,
Who thus afflicted this poor worm:
"My husband dead, myself alone;"
This was the burden of my moan.

Murmuring words are wafted up
To Him who is the widow's prop,
That he had left me all alone;
My hopes and pleasures all were gone;
O'er my heavy laden soul
Stormy billows of passion roll.

Clouds of adversity sever,
Sorrow does not last forever,
Pleasure still will come to mortals,
Standing e'en at sorrow's portals,
Through the dark mists thick and dun,
Still again we see the sun.

So my soul, the light perceiving,
As it flowed upon it, gleaming,
Turned my thoughts to heaven above,
To the spirit divine of love;
Then I felt that his correction
Was a proof of his protection.

THE DOUBLE PLOT.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

"NEVER, never, never!"

Ah! what a pretty picture Georgie Abbott made, as she stood up in the might of her pride and anger, and repeated the words quoted above. Although I was her teacher, and should have felt a keen pang of regret at heart at such a display of temper, I found myself instead, admiring the queenly poise of her head; the full height to which she had drawn her well rounded figure; and even the very way in which her little foot was set upon the gravelled walk. Her straw hat had fallen back from her face, and its white satin ribbons lay loosely about her bare neck, like bands of silver; while the moonlight stole over the golden-brown braids of her luxuriant hair, tinging them softly with its radiance.

Should I speak to her, as was most emphatically my duty, or like a true daughter of Eve, sit by my window and watch the closing of the little farce? Alas, I was but a young teacher, comparatively speaking, and the stern, practical life of two years in Wells Seminary had not quite rooted out the love of sentiment and romance that from early youth had known a welcome home within me. So I did the latter—I watched.

"But, Georgie," spoke a voice which I at once recognized as belonging to my young friend, Walter Marston, "you appear like one insane. Will you not listen to reason?"

"Not from you, most assuredly, though you speak with the power and force of a very god! I hate you for the words you have spoken to me!—I hate you—hate you!"

There was a moment's pause, during which Walter retired a few paces, putting on the airs of a prince, while Georgie fretted out the ends of her blue sash with her slender white fingers.

"Very well," said Walter, tossing the brown hair which the damp evening air had made into soft, brown rings, from his forehead.

Georgie bowed.

"If I am ill and send for you—"

"I'll never go to you, Walter Marston, never!" interrupted the young girl.

"Very well," came again from the lips of Walter, as he turned half reluctantly away.

"Take, this, if you please!" cried Georgie. And I could see her draw hastily a golden circlet from her finger. "And this," snatching from her hair a golden cross—"I want nothing of yours about me!"

"Do not dare thrust such paltry trifles in my face, Georgie Abbott, or even you may find there is a bound to my endurance."

All the blood of the proud Marstons in Walter's veins was aroused, I knew at once by the quivering tone in which he spoke, as he tore the baubles from Georgie's grasp, and ground them into the dust with his foot, turning away from her without further word or comment.

There was something in the young man's voice, something in his firm tread, as he walked away, that roused into life memories that had slumbered for years within my bosom. In vain I tried to crush them back into oblivion as they came up before me; but it was a useless task, and like a weary child I buried my face in my hands, and burst into tears. When young, like Georgie Abbott, for a cruel temper I had allowed the sweetest years of my life to slip away from me in a moment's time of anger. How the little scene I had just witnessed called back into the living present a far-past evening of my life! How the old yearning for love and tenderness sprang up anew within my woman's heart, and went searchingly out for a dear one whom I had taught myself to look upon as dead—forever dead to me. How I recalled looks, tones and words that had been so long hushed in the chilly tomb of forgetfulness. And how I prayed God to give me strength to walk firmly and without wavering, my cruel way of thorns, though my feet were torn and bleeding all the while.

As I sat swaying myself back and forward in my rocking-chair, trying to soothe my perturbed thoughts back to the quiet channel in which they were wont to flow, I heard the quick step of Walter Marston in the hall that led to my room, and before I could wipe the tears from my eyes, he rapped hastily upon my door.

"I came to bid you good-by," he said, as I met him. "I shall start for home to-morrow."

"So soon, Walter—how is this?" I asked, placing him a chair.

"O, there seems little use in remaining here longer. I am not feeling very strong yet, and a home-atmosphere is better than any other for an invalid."

"In some cases, though I should hardly think so in yours," I answered. "Will Georgie return with you?"

"I think not."

"And why?"

"Because, Elsa, Georgie hates me—because she has never loved me!" he answered, with a vehemence that quite startled me.

"It was useless for me to try to conceal from Walter my knowledge of his quarrel with Georgie, and so I told him as plainly and simply as I could, what I knew of it, begging him to be led by a calm, cool judgment in the affair, rather than the fierce, passionate counsellings of his meaner nature, which threatened to overpower the good."

"But Georgie does not love me!"

"You are mistaken, Walter, she does love you. She has been hasty, even as you have been, but can you not pardon her as you hope to be pardoned?"

"Did you ever love?" he asked quickly, fixing his dark hazel eyes upon my face, regardless of the question I had asked him. "And if so, would it have been possible for you to have allowed such words to have fallen from your lips, as did from Georgie's this evening?"

"I have loved, Walter," I said in a quivering voice. "I loved fervently, and with all the strength of a warm, passionate heart; and more, I spoke just such cruel words to the man I loved as Georgie gave to you this evening. My words were like keen blades of steel. They ran between his heart and mine, severing them forever. That is why my life is a sad and lonely one; why my lot is not blessed like other women's. O, let it be a lesson to you!"

Tears shone in the dark eyes of Walter, and with a quick, rapid movement, he was by my side with outstretched hands, saying:

"O, Elsa, I have your secret at last! Elsa, dear sister Elsa, you once loved my brother Robert! Do not shake your head—I am sure of it; and that is why you are moping your life away in this miserable seminary, and why Robert stays away from home so long. I have it—I have it!"

"Do not speak of this, Walter," I said, eagerly, clasping his hands. "If you have any regard for me, do not speak of it to—"

"Whom?"

"To him."

"To Robert?"

I bowed my head.

"It shall be as you wish," he answered, very thoughtfully.

"And now let us talk of Georgie," I said, anxious to turn the conversation into a new channel.

"And what of her?" asked Walter, growing chilly as an iceberg at the mere mention of her name.

"She loves you," I repeated.

"That remains to be proved," was the crustily given reply.

"And may I prove it to you?" I asked. "Will you allow yourself to be convinced?"

"If I cannot help it, most certainly," was the answer.

"And will you trust everything to me, and do as I bid you?"

"Even as you wish, my counsellor."

"Then you may be as happy as you choose, for I am certain of my success."

Walter shook his head moodily, but I saw that there was a new light in his eye, and that in spite of his assumed air of unbelief he really trusted in what I had told him. And so we parted.

"I have a letter containing news from Walter Marston, written by a friend of his," I said, in a matter-of-fact tone to Georgie Abbott, as she lingered by my side one afternoon in my recitation-room. "It is very sad, too—very sad. But, excuse me, you wished to know something of your French lesson. How many pages did I give you in Le Grand Pere?"

I looked up from my book as I asked the question. Georgie was clinging hold of a chair, looking as white and ghastly as the muslin robe she wore. The pallor of her face frightened me, although I assumed an air of easy indifference, and assured her that the next day's translation was exceedingly simple.

"Will you go up to my room with me?" I asked, rising and locking my desk.

"No—no; do not go—" she half gasped—"tell me what you know of—of—Walter!"

"O, of Walter! Didn't I finish telling you about him? Why, he says, or rather his friend writes for him, that if any of his friends at Wells Seminary wish to see him, they must go to Elton at once. That is all."

"All, Miss Herbert, all—and is it not enough, in Heaven's name? When did you receive the letter?"

"Yesterday morning."

"And are you not going to him?"

"I fear I shall not be able to," I replied, coolly.

"And is this your boasted love and friendship for him? This, your sisterly tenderness, that congeals into ice when he is most in need of your sympathy and kindness? May I be delivered from all such!"

"You are getting excited, Miss Abbott," I remarked. "You are one of Mr. Marston's friends, why do you not go to him?"

But she did not deign me an answer, as with curling lip, and cheeks like the pale petals of the lily that hung upon her bosom, she swept from the room.

"I wonder what will be her next step?" I said, mentally, as I followed her moodily from the school-room, and up the long walk that led to the boarding-house. "Will she go to Walter alone—will her pride allow her to do that?"

"A letter for you, Miss Herbert," said Professor Howard, at that moment, coming suddenly upon me from a by-path. "I have had it in my possession all the afternoon. My neglect is quite inexcusable, I am well aware."

With an eagerness that I could not well account for, I took the missive from his hand, and turned unceremoniously into the walk he had left. The superscription of the letter was in the familiar hand-writing of Walter Marston. Why did I tremble to break the seal? With fingers that seemed loth to do my bidding, I tore it open and read:

"DEAR ELSA:—Come to Elton at once. I have not time now to explain, only to say, if you value the happiness of a human heart, or care to prolong for a few days one human life—come!"
"Truly yours, WALTER MARSTON."

What did it mean? Whose life could I prolong—whose happiness ensure by going to Elton? Was it a little hoax of Walter's? No, it could not be—the note was too earnest and emphatic for that, beside, the freak was not at all like one of his. Had Robert returned? No, that was not possible, for but a few weeks before I had been told that he was thousands of miles away. I was in a maze of doubt and wonder, looking about me vainly, for something that would throw the faintest ray of light upon the mystery. But the light did not appear, and so I set myself rapidly about preparing for my sudden departure. All this while, as I bustled hurriedly about my chamber, I was conscious that the occupant of the room above my own was preparing, as well as myself, for something aside from the quiet, monotonous routine of every-day, school life. I could hear the moving of trunks, the hurried orders as to the disposal of this thing and that, given to the servant in attendance, and occasionally recognized the fleet step of Georgie Abbott, as she sprang nervously up and down the stairs. My suspicions that she was making ready for a visit to Elton were confirmed beyond a doubt, when the carriage came to take me to the depot, for the same one started her upon her momentous journey.

"It seems you have changed your mind, Miss Herbert," she said, haughtily to me, as we stood together while buying our tickets in the ladies' room.

"I have received another letter since I conversed with you," I replied.

"How was he?" she faltered.

"In such a condition that my presence was demanded there at once. I could not treat the urgent request lightly, and so have left everything for the sake of complying with it."

"God grant that I may not be too late!" murmured Georgie, sinking back upon the seat beside me. "O, Miss Herbert, I am so very, very miserable!"

I drew the trembling form of the young girl close to my side, and bade her be of good cheer. Looking upon her pale face as she leaned her head upon my shoulder, I condemned myself bitterly for the part I had taken in the really cruel affair. For a moment, I resolved to confess it all to her, trusting to her good sense and her warm love for Walter for her forgiveness, but the thought of the strange, mystical letter I had received checked me, and I determined to let the affair terminate in its originally planned denouement.

It was very late that evening when we arrived at the fine old home of the Marstons. The family carriage was waiting for us at the depot, but only servants were with it to escort us further. Every moment the mystery grew more incomprehensible to me. What could it all mean? Why, on entering the house were Georgie and I conducted formally to our chambers, as though we were entire strangers? Why did the servants shake their heads silently when we asked for the sick—for Walter? O, it was very, very strange to me!—and more inexplicable still was it, when a servant came up to our rooms to conduct us down to the supper-room. Not to the family dining-hall, but a quiet, luxurious little nest of a room that led out of the library. What could it mean?—ay, what did it mean? When we entered the room we found two gentlemen apparently waiting to receive us. Into the arms of one Georgie rushed very unceremoniously, crying at the top of her voice:

"Dear, dear Walter, you are alive—you are alive!"

The other stood looking earnestly and anxiously at me, while a mingled tide of hope, fear and uncertainty swept over my soul. With a tottering, feeble step I went forward, led by the quick, sunshiny smile that broke gloriously over his face, while the joy and thanksgiving of our hearts went forth in these words:

"Robert!"

"Elsa!"

That evening's happiness I will pass over, because I have a horror of depicting accurately a love scene, more especially a two-fold one, as in this case it proved to be. But the next morning I attempted to reprove Walter for the fibbing letter he had sent me the day before. But he only laughed merrily at the mention of it, assuring me that he was convinced beyond the possibility of a doubt before he wrote the letter, that Robert's life and happiness were both in imminent danger. And then Georgie shook her white finger menacingly towards me, and bade me not complain of other people's deception, while there was such a load of guilt upon my own shoulder.

But what is best, reader, this double plot is to end in a double wedding next Sabbath evening. Who will come to it? Echo answers, "w-h-o-o?"

CULTIVATE CHEERFULNESS.

An anxious, restless temper, that runs to meet care on its way, that regrets lost opportunities too much, and that is over painstaking in contrivances for happiness, is foolish and should not be indulged. If you cannot be happy in one way, be happy in another, and this facility of disposition wants but little aid from philosophy, for health and good humor are almost the whole affair. Many run about after felicity, like an absent man hunting for his hat, while it is on his head, or in his hand. Though sometimes small evils, like invisible insects, inflict great pain, and a single hair may stop a vast machine; yet the chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex one, and in prudently cultivating an undergrowth of small pleasures, since very few great ones, alas! are let on long leases.
—Richard Sharp.

SONNET.

It must be so—my infant love must find
In my own breast a cradle and a grave;
Like a rich jewel hid beneath the wave,
Or rebel spirit, bound within the rind
Of some old wreathed oak, or fast enshrined
In the cold durance of an echoing cave:—
Yes, better thus, than cold disdain to brave,—
Or worse to faint the quiet of that mind,
That decks its temple with unearthly grace.
Together must we dwell—my dream and I,
Unknown must live, and unregarded die,—
Rather than soil the lustre of that face,
Or drive that laughing dimple from its place,
Or leave that white breast with a painful sigh.

HARTLEY COLERIDGE.

I PRAY FOR THEE.

BY ANNA M. BATES.

I pray for thee when the faint primrose flowers
 Waken in beauty 'neath the first pale star,
 When dew and freshness hallow all the hours,
 And Luna shines from far.
 As in the west the sunset's golden splendor
 Fades from the valleys and the lake's blue sea,
 'Tis then I kneel with memory pure and tender,
 And pray for thee!

Amid the glory of the year we parted,
 In earth's sad, changeful realm to meet no more,
 And yet the prayers I proffer, faithful hearted,
 Are pure as those of yore;
 Although I know not wheresoe'er thy dwelling,
 On coast or distant island it may be,
 Ever at eve the same fond thought is swelling,
 I pray for thee!

I list the twilight bell's low undulations,
 As on the mournful winds they faint and fall,
 I dream beyond that fairer habitations
 Will one day hold us all.
 O, by the memory that is true and tender,
 My fond remembrance of what used to be,
 Now in the sunset time of youth's gay splendor
 I pray for thee!

And yet I know not but thou little heedest
 The chaplet that unchangingly I twine.
 The vestal holy flame that Memory feedeth
 Forever by her shrine;
 And e'en though time may gather gloom without me,
 Whether in grief or gladness we may be,
 That every joy and blessing be about thee,
 I pray for thee!

HARRY ROMAIN'S MISTAKE.

BY EVA MORDAUNT.

HARRY ROMAIN was young, handsome and rich; he was esteemed a "first-rate fellow" among his bachelor friends, and as for the gentler sex, anxious mamas assumed their blandest air when he approached, and their lovely daughters greeted him with their most bewitching smiles. Ah! Harry had no reason to complain of the world's treating him ill—he was blessed with everything needful to make him the happiest of dogs—and very well satisfied was he with himself one fine morning as he stepped aboard the cars bound for his country-seat. It was a new acquisition of his—this country-seat. An old uncle, whom Harry's parents had honored by giving his name to their son, and for whom Harry entertained about as much regard as for the man in the moon, or any other antiquated individual, had bequeathed it to him when he departed this life some months before.

So Harry was going down to examine his new property, and though he thought it would have been quite as convenient if the place had been a little nearer civilized beings, still, if there were good fishing and hunting in the neighborhood, he doubted not he might kill some time there in company with two or three of the fellows whom he would send for. Though rather out of humor with the long journey, yet on the whole, Harry was pretty good natured as he stepped from the cars, and proceeded to the flourishing hotel which adorned the village of B—. Making himself known to the landlord, that individual, with much respect and great ceremony, informed him that his carriage was in waiting.

20

"Jupiter! that's not so bad," ejaculated he, as a plain but elegant carriage, drawn by a splendid pair of iron-greys, met his view. The coachman, evidently an old family servant, bowed low as the landlord presented his master, and opened the door with as much empressement as if for a prince. The ride over a smooth, hard road, on the softest of cushions and the easiest of springs, relieved Harry's cramped limbs, and by the time he reached the mansion, he was in a sufficiently comfortable state of mind to note and appreciate the beauties of the place. The house was a quaint, irregular pile of buildings, part of which had been added from time to time, evidently with more regard to convenience, than beauty of architecture, surrounded on every side by far-stretching plains of verdure, thickly studded with noble trees of many years' growth. The domains were skirted for near their whole extent by a thick wood, and far away in another direction, rose the blue tops of the distant mountains.

Harry had written to the housekeeper of his coming, so that she was expecting him, and evidently great preparations had been made to receive the new master. And Harry liked the looks; here was a nice place for him to rusticate, and he resolved not to let his sisters Fan and Sue get wind of it, for they would be sure to be charmed with the romantic situation, and insist upon taking possession immediately. After attending to the wants of the inner man, he sauntered out for a stroll over his extensive grounds, and wandered on till he reached the forest that skirted them. Following a well-trodden path, he entered the forest, and as he strolled on, he was charmed, as many a denizen of the close city has been before, with the fresh air, and bright, clear sky of the country. The breeze fragrant with the odor of the pine trees invigorated him, and as he wandered on, he revelled in a sense of buoyancy which he had seldom experienced. Suddenly he came upon an opening amid the trees. The setting sun tinged the bright hue of the grass with a soft radiance, and cast a glittering shade upon the waters of a little brook which murmured near.

"Truly, this is a very Eden, and there, as I live, is an Eve, or rather a naiad, just risen from the pearly wave," he said, as he saw a maiden laving her white feet in the gurgling stream.

She turned around at his words, and disclosed a countenance of fresh, young beauty. Glossy brown locks dishevelled by her employment, fell around a face of the most perfect oval, which was lighted up by lustrous orbs of the richest blue; while a pink flush, which had risen to her cheeks at the sight of a stranger, heightened and greatly enhanced her beauty. Accustomed as Harry was to the surpassing loveliness of ball room belles, he thought he had never seen anything so beautiful as this barefooted maiden, as she stood with the unconscious grace of a startled fawn.

"Pardon me, fair maid," he said, advancing and bowing low, "pardon me for thus disturbing your gambols in your native element. 'Tis seldom that the goddesses of the wave deign to show themselves to mortals."

A look of innocent wonder overspread her face as he spoke, and her blue orbs dilated as she looked at him.

"I am no goddess, sir," she said, "only a simple cottage maid wading in the brook."

Her words recalled Harry to himself, and smiling at the thought of what his aristocratic mama and elegant sisters would say to see him thus entranced at the sight of a country girl, he again addressed her, but this time in language suited to her comprehension. She replied fearlessly, for child of the woods as she was, she knew not fear, and charmed by her beauty and artless grace, Harry Romaine lingered long by the brook in the forest glade.

But the deepening shadows at length warned him of the lateness of the hour, and accompanying the rustic maid to a cottage not far distant, he bade her good night with as much deference as he would have shown the most polished belle of his acquaintance, and then pursued his homeward way. But thoughts of the beautiful creature he had left accompanied him, and for the first time in his life, the vision of a beautiful maiden mingled with his dreams. It was not strange then that he wondered somewhat when he remembered it the following morning, and still more, when in the course of his rambles about the grounds, a fair young face, with eyes of richest blue would rise before him, and make itself the centre of his thoughts. He was not wont to be taken in that way, it was something new to him—rather ludicrous to be sure—that he was so struck by that pretty little rustic, and yet at the sunset hour he found himself pursuing the old path to the forest glade.

As he expected, its presiding deity was there, seated on the moss-covered roots of a stalwart oak. A bright flush rose to her cheek as she acknowledged his greeting, and she made a slight movement as if to rise as he seated himself beside her, but he detained her, and with the address of a polished man of the world, placing her entirely at her ease, he entered into conversation. Her naïve, artless innocence charmed him, man of the world as he was, and accustomed to the wiles and arts of fashionable women, and the atmosphere of freshness which seemed to encircle her, refreshed him, blaze with fashionable dissipation. And as for her, child of the woods, she could sit for hours listening to tales of the gay world, of which hitherto she had scarcely dreamed, fascinated by his polished manners, so different from those of the boors around her, from any one she had ever seen.

And thus it happened that for many days the same sunset hour found them sitting side by side at the foot of the moss-grown oak, but now his arm encircled her waist, and her head rested on his bosom, while he taught her the blissful lesson of love. And she was an apt scholar—that young, tender thing—she had learned to love him, and her life, before his coming as calm as the unruffled bosom of a peaceful lake, was now rendered tumultuous and fevered by the strange passion that throbbed in her veins. Through the long day she waited wearily, performing mechanically her accustomed duties, till the round, red sun trembled on the horizon, and then, as his last bright beam sank behind the distant hills, she sought the forest glade to drink yet deeper of the intoxicating draught which she had already quaffed nearly to the dregs. But the awaking came at last—her brief, bright dream was rudely interrupted. Harry was going to leave B—. Messages and letters innumerable had come to him to know what he could find to do with himself in that dull place—what could possess him to bury himself alive all summer, and at last came a summons from his proud mother to meet her immediately at a fashionable watering place. He was well situated, he was not suffering with ennui—not at all—but like many another brave man, Harry was not insensible to the ridicule of his acquaintance, or, still more, to the sneers of his haughty sisters. He must go—he must obey his mother's summons; but as he pursued the old path that night, he thought remorsefully of the young Being who confided so trustingly in him. He hated to leave her—but what could a fellow do?—he might marry her, as he had half a mind to do, but then he thought of the appearance she would make beside his haughty sisters, so queenly and so proud, and his heart failed him. She was a sweet little wood flower—a tender violet, breathing fragrance in its native air—but if transplanted to the hot house of the gay world, and placed beside the showy exotics of its belles, would she thrive as well? No; his mind was made up when he joined her, though he wavered somewhat as he took her in his arms, thinking it was the last time that he should hold her thus, and looked down into the clear depths of her blue eyes.

"Meta," he said, at last; "Meta, I am come to bid you farewell. I must leave you to-morrow."

Ah! in her wild dream of love she had not thought of separation. Delirious with the joy of the present, she had not glanced to the future, and as the terrible truth forced itself upon her that she was to be alone again—alone with nothing to look forward to—she sank upon his breast in a perfect abandon of grief. It distressed him—this poor child weeping so bitterly for his loss—and with gentle, tender words he sought to soothe her.

"Look up, darling," he said, "look up! Do not grieve so. I will come again in a few weeks. I must go now, but I will come to you again very soon."

It comforted her—his promise to return soon—for trusting in him as she did, she thought not of his breaking it, and she smothered her sobs that they might not distress him—unselfish, even in her grief. A long time the lovers sat there, Harry cursing the fate that loaded him with chains stronger than those of iron, and wishing himself for the nonce a rustic youth, with no conventional fetters to bind him; and Meta, poor Meta, longing vainly to leave her country home and enter the gay world which seemed so beautiful to her. At last the heavy night drowsed Harry, and plucking a tiny violet from its mossy bed by the rivulet's bank, he placed it in her hand, saying:

"Keep that in remembrance of me, darling."

Then, after one wild, passionate embrace he left her. His reappearance in the fashionable world created some excitement, but answering all inquiries by saying that he had been rusticated a little, he plunged anew into the vortex of dissipation, which after his long absence had somewhat the zest of novelty. And alas for Meta, left behind in the lonesome village! At first, Harry had intended to return to her, but as the weeks sped on, the memory of her grew fainter and fainter, until at last all thoughts of the beautiful being who was once so dear to him had entirely vanished from his mind. And while Meta watched for him with an eagerness which quickened every pulse, and sharpened every nerve, refusing the terrible thought that he had forgotten her, which sometimes would arise down in her heart, he was bowing low before another and more pretentious shrine. New York was ringing with the praises of a Southern belle, who was beautiful, accomplished, and better than all, rich. Harry had joined the train of her admirers, and incited to exertion by the number of competitors, he at last won the prize, and gave his mother and sisters the pleasure of superintending one of the most brilliant weddings of the season. A fashionable couple they made—Harry loved his wife as he did his horses—she added to the eclat of his establishment, and she esteemed him as she did her bouquet holder, or her opera-glass—he was necessary to her convenience.

The opera house was crowded with the beauty and fashion of the city. A new star was to make her appearance, and the vast sea of waving plumes and sparkling gems surged and swelled with expectation. But suddenly every voice was hushed, and every eye turned toward the stage, as a tall, graceful form glided silently on, and commenced her role. Wave upon wave of liquid melody floated out upon the air, and enchained the audience as by a strange spell. When it ceased for a moment none stirred, and then a perfect ovation of applause greeted the fair debutante. Again and again the silver tones were heard, and each time greeted with the thunders of applause. She was successful—it was a proud moment for the fair singer, as she heard the deafening cries which called her before the curtain to receive the meed of her success.

Harry Romaine was at the opera, of course—everybody was there—and as he gazed upon the great songstress, he was startled by the memories her pale face called up. It seemed familiar to him—he must have seen it before—and yet he could not remember where. Again and again he was at the opera, again and again he gazed upon the strangely familiar face, till one night as she was electrifying the whole audience with her passionate rendering of Norma, he recognized that terrible look of agony, and as by an electric flash the memory of where he had seen her came to him. Yes, he remembered it all now—the verdant glen in the wildwood shade, and the fair maiden laving her feet in the pearly brook. The slight form had rounded into the fuller beauty of womanhood, and the chestnut locks were darker than when he saw them last. But the eyes, the deep blue eyes, were the same, and as he thought of them he remembered the days of long ago, when he sat by her side and gazed into their clear depths, reading her whole soul there. His conscience reproached him now for having neglected her so long, and he wondered if she still remembered those old times, and would recognize him now. He would try her at any rate, he thought, and the next night of her appearance found him at the opera, with a tiny violet of precious stones in his hand.

She had finished her last song, and was retiring, when among the deluge of bouquets that were showered upon her, a garland of snow-white roses, with the glittering toy attached, fell directly at her feet. The curtain fell and concealed her from view, but in a moment she appeared again in answer to the loud call which resounded from every part of the house. Harry Romaine bent forward, and gazed at her eagerly as she advanced—yes, there gleaming amid the tresses of her beautiful hair, was the jewelled flower. So, she had not forgotten him; she remembered him yet, and with a thrill of something like the old passion at his heart, hardly knowing his own purpose for doing so, he sought her behind the scenes.

She sat alone in her dressing-room in an attitude of thought, her hands clasped upon her bosom, and her eyes looking away into the land of dreams. She looked up at him as he entered, and rising slowly greeted him with a languid air.

"Meta," he said, passionately, "why this cold welcome?"

"Why should you expect otherwise?" said she, looking at him coldly.

"Why," exclaimed he, "you wear my flower—surely you mean that to signify that you have not forgotten me—that you will hear me?"

"I have forgotten everything, Mr. Romaine," replied she, "excepting that you are a married man, and that I am a virtuous woman. Under these circumstances, you must see plainly as I do, that it is useless for us to meet."

He had not thought of that—he had been impelled by a blind instinct to seek her. Of what avail if she would hear him! he was tied to another, and even if he were not, could he marry an actress—a public singer? Alas, no!

"But why then, did you wear my flower?" he asked, at last.

"That I might tell you this once for all," she said. "Take it—I want it not," and disengaging it from her hair, she handed it to him.

He dashed it passionately to the ground.

"Tell me that you love me, Meta," he exclaimed; "tell me you love me still."

"I love nothing," she said, a gleam of triumph flashing from her blue eyes—"nothing except my art. If you think one lingering ray of love for you prompted me to grant you this meeting, Mr. Romaine, you are deceived. I have recovered from that little folly long ago. It was as I said, because I wished no lovers dancing attendance upon me, and I thought I would tell you so myself."

Ah! the shaft had hit. She could see that by the deadly pallor of his face and the relaxing limbs. She was richly repaid for all he had made her suffer, her revenge was ample, and pressing her hands to her bosom, upon which, close to her heart, lay in a golden case the little, withered violet he had given her long ago, she left him—left him forever.

Alas for those two young hearts, severed by one fatal mistake. Bitterly now did Harry Romaine lament the accursed pride which had made him desert the poor cottage girl, and hope vainly to find his happiness in the hollow glare of fashionable life. From the fatal night when the consciousness of his mistake forced itself upon him, he sought the wine cup and the gaming table, and when at last his high station or his immense wealth could no longer conceal from the world his degradation, who guessed the terrible sorrow which had driven him to the brink of the precipice from which he had fallen? None—none save one—and though his set whispered it about among themselves, and wondered how his haughty relatives could bear it, yet they never thought that the brilliant singer, whose very name was a household word, could reveal aught of Harry Romaine's heart history.

THE LESSON OF THE GARDEN.

A garden is a beautiful book, writ by the finger of God; every flower and every leaf is a letter. You have only to learn them—and he is a poor dunce that cannot, if he will, do that—to learn them, and join them, and then to go on reading and reading, and you will find yourself carried away from the earth to the skies by the beautiful story you are going through. You do not know what beautiful thoughts—for they are nothing short—grow out of the ground, and seem to talk to a man. And then there are some flowers, they always seem to me like over-dutiful children: tend them ever so little, and they come up and flourish, and show, as I may say, their bright and happy faces to you.—Jerrold.

THE ROCK OF CASHEL.

[By an oversight the concluding portion of this story, following page 268 of our last number, was omitted. It is here given.]

"Here!" said Aileen's own voice, as she came forward, and bent over him. "My dear young master, I have not been absent from you night nor day for a week."

"You are kind, Aileen, but now let me sleep."

He lay in this state several days. Some internal disease the surgeon said was coming on, the effect of fever. Donald knew what the trouble was, better than any medical man. During his sickness he had an impression that a fair face had sometimes bent over him. Now it was withdrawn, and he began to think it might be only Aileen's. Where was Matilda, that she did not come to him if only for a moment? He questioned Aileen one day.

"Bless you, master Donald! hasn't she bin here day after day, as soon as I tould her yees were asleep, and she standing by your bed and crying and moaning like a Banshee, and kissing your poor white lips?"

"Hush, Aileen, you will kill me with joy."

"And it's all true, master Donald."

And it was true. Donald had injured himself, by carrying her down the ladder that night, and her grief was only equalled by her love.

"How shall I ever pay you for all you have suffered through us?" asked Mr. Moore, when Donald was pronounced well enough to go home. "The little I am possessed of is yours. Stay with us, and share it. Would that it were more for your sake."

Donald smiled. "Are you willing to give me all?" he asked. "You have only one treasure which I covet."

"And what may that be?"

"Your daughter," said Donald, softly, for he just saw her enter the room.

"Come here, Matilda, and hear what this rash youth is asking me for."

She approached, blushing as if she knew already. That morning she had a long conversation with Donald, and she conjectured what he might now have been saying. Her father took her willing hand and placed it in her lover's.

The fifth of October, 1770, saw the marriage of two young persons in the grand cathedral. The service was performed by the archbishop himself, and all Cashel witnessed the ceremony. The next year the fortunes of Donald were considerably altered by the death of an uncle, of whom he had never before heard; who left him a free and unincumbered estate, to which he gave the name of Heathcliffe.

AN ECCENTRIC ENTHUSIAST.

In Koslin, a small town of Pomerania, one of the most wonderful testaments ever made has lately been executed. Twenty years ago a surgeon named Kauffmann died there, bequeathing his whole fortune to the town. As soon as the yearly interest of this legacy amounts to about £1000, which is now the case, a place of public amusement is to be founded for the use of the poor. Here botany and agriculture are to be taught in an entertaining way, and 65 beehives (to denote his age) are always to be kept. Those persons who most diligently attend his institution are to be rewarded for their zeal by premiums and advertisements in the newspapers announcing their merits. Once a year a great banquet is to take place. The principal dish is to consist of sour milk, and it is a law of the institution that, through the whole course of the year, everybody who desires to have sour milk shall receive one portion a day gratis. The next dish at the banquet is to consist of honey and apples. Salt and pepper are to stand on the table, guarded, however, by three large locks, which, according to the testator's will, must be rather difficult to open. Every one of the banqueters who makes use of this salt and pepper has to ask formally the permission of the company, which is to be given. Nobody, however, is to assist the man in his suicidal design of helping himself to salt. The servants at the banquet are to consist of two persons only, viz., a midwife and a grave-digger. When this sumptuous banquet is over, a solemn farewell is to be drunk to the shadow of the testator in the following words:—"Yea, he was right; tea, brandy, wine, coffee, and spices are the most fearful enemies of humanity if used otherwise than as medicine. Yea, he was right." The institution is to bear the name of the "Gall Stone."—English paper.

AN INFAMOUS DEED.

In the middle of the eighteenth century there was an actress on the French stage, of the name of Chantilly. She, though beloved by Maurice de Saxe, preferred a more honorable attachment, and married Favart, the well-known writer of songs and comic operas. Maurice, amazed at her boldness, applied for aid to the French crown. That he should have made such an application is sufficiently strange; but the result of it is hardly to be paralleled except in some eastern despotism. The government of France, on hearing the circumstances, had the inconceivable baseness to issue an order directing Favart to abandon his wife, and entrust her to the charge of Maurice.

These are among the insufferable provocations by which the blood of men is made to boil in their veins. Who can wonder that the greatest and noblest minds in France were filled with loathing at the government by whom such things were done? If we, notwithstanding the distance of time and country, are roused to indignation by the mere mention of them, what must have been felt by those before whose eyes they actually occurred?—Buckle's History of Civilization.

Scandal will rub out like dirt, when it is dry.

CLOUD IN THE CLOUD-LAND.

BY DI VERNON.

Cloud in the cloudland,
 Whither art thou winging,
 Lightly and free?
 If from the southward
 Breezes sweet thou'rt bringing,
 Bear them to me!
 Cloud in the cloud-land,
 Whither art thou roaming
 O'er the blue sky?
 Art thou from the tropics!
 From the Indies coming?
 Hither, O, hie!

Cloud in the cloud-land,
 Tell me of the summer
 Yonder, afar!
 Tell of the orange groves,
 Whence comes the murmur
 Of love's guitar.
 Tell of the minstrels,
 With their tresses flowing,
 And their dark eyes;
 Eyes like the eagle's
 Burning glances throwing,
 'Neath twilight skies.

Cloud in the cloud-land,
 Whisper of the flowers
 Blossoming fair;
 Radiant in the gardens,
 Purest in the bowers,
 Fragrant and rare.
 If from the southward,
 Cloud, thou art winging
 Lightly and free;
 Bear from the flowerets,
 Sweets ever flinging,
 Fragrance to me!

THE UNFULFILLED PROPHECY.

BY MAURICE SKILTON.

THIRTY-NINE years ago, on a cold, blustering March morning, cloudy, gray and comfortless, Agnes Murray was born. The old nurse, Elsie Cameron, full of proverbs and fancies brought from the Scottish hills where they are so rife, shook her head, and predicted a dark and stormy life for the wee lassie, and the young mother whose childhood opened in the same land, watched her ancient attendant with anxiety, to see if she was thinking of a cloudy future for her bairn. The child showed no token, however, of any storm pent up within her little frame. She lay for weeks perfectly quiet when undisturbed, whether sleeping, or with large dark eyes wide open, with a look as if she too could look into the future, but not as if it betokened dread or dismay.

Meantime she was growing every day more lovely, filling the hearts of the parents with a calm, satisfied delight that showed itself in no extravagant expressions, but in a gentle, placid look which betokened depth and strength. The father of the child was also of Scottish descent, although born in America; and he too, possessed many of the peculiar traits of character that are usually found in the people of that race. He was in the enjoyment of a small clerkship in one of the courts of law, and his savings had enabled him to make a comfortable home, as neat as it was unpretending. A cottage, simply furnished, whose crowning beauty was a garden, carefully tended, and over whose low roof the vines lay purpling in the autumn sun, was his only visible possession. But Andrew Murray's best wealth lay in a quiet and contented spirit, and to this inheritance his little daughter seemed born to succeed, even in spite of the stormy accompaniments of her advent.

Two years afterwards, another child came, not in tempest, but on the first, sweet, dewy morning of the poetical month of May, when crocus and violet, and the pure white strawberry blossom had begun to creep on the side of the garden, and the blithe song of the robin in the trees before the window was almost the first sound upon her infant ear. They called her Helen, in memory of Mrs. Murray's own mother, who died just after her daughter married Andrew Murray.

It was rare to see the little "wiselike" Agnes, as old Elsie called her, taking upon herself the care and motherly ways of a much older sister, and bestowing upon the somewhat peevish baby the full measure of an affection as devoted and untiring as her mother's. This care over her sister continued without interruption, until the children were respectively twelve and fourteen years old. Their childhood had passed almost without a cloud; for although Helen had not the sweet and contented disposition of her sister, yet, as she was constantly yielded to by the whole family, she had no occasion to indulge the wrath which only waited an opportunity of provocation to break forth in true Highland fashion. Their dispositions were not more unlike than their persons. There was scarcely a shade of resemblance in their faces, although each was very lovely. Agnes had the dark eyes and hair of her father, and the same softly pencilled eyebrows and long lashes that made Andrew Murray distinguished everywhere for his beauty, while she inherited also, his tall, elastic figure, and the unconscious grace and dignity of manner so observable in him. Helen was like her mother—petite in form, and a blonde in complexion, with fair, light hair, and eyes that showed sometimes blue, sometimes gray, and in moments of intense excitement, were nearly black.

Andrew Murray's health had been declining almost imperceptibly for four or five years. A slight pain in the side, a failing appetite, and a gradual wasting of the whole frame, were the only tokens; but they were sure ones. They came so slowly that the wife scarcely saw the signs at all. But he felt that the destroyer was doing his work, although secretly and silently. A few days of respite from the pen, and inhaling the fresh air from the sea, as he walked in his pleasant little garden, restored him temporarily; but he soon sunk into a state from which he never rallied. No sick bed nor darkened room would he consent to enter. In the pleasant little summer home, overhung with grapevines, and the roses climbing round its sides, he was sleeping in the sultry noontide, when scarcely a breath came from the sea. His easy chair had been carried thither, and pillows were piled up, so that his faint breath might have the freedom which only a sitting posture could give. Around him sat his wife and children, half unconscious of his true state, and coming in and out with a hurried and anxious air, was old Elsie, still the faithful nurse, whenever she was needed at the cottage. She was now calling them to the noon meal, and took her own place beside the invalid. There were unmistakable tokens of approaching death to her practised eye; but she would not call them yet. "He will waken first," she thought, "and they will only disturb this quiet slumber." But while she watched, she saw that no breath came through the open lips. She placed her hand upon his heart, and there was no pulsation there. Without pain or suffering, without even a struggle, Andrew Murray had closed his eyes upon all things dear and beautiful on earth—passing away without even a farewell to those whom he loved.

We will not describe what followed. Every day, every hour, perhaps, there is death somewhere, and everywhere the living mourn; each with an intensity proportioned not only to the loss, but also to the peculiar temperament of the individual mourner. Such occasions do not change persons. They only bring out the depth of feelings never suspected to exist in them before; or they develop calmness and firmness which no one ever gave them credit for possessing. So it was with poor Agnes Murray and her children. For many months, the cottage looked too desolate for endurance; but as time softened imperceptibly the memory of their great sorrow, they lifted up their fair heads, like flowers after the storm, where the rain of yesterday gives place to the soft dew of to-morrow.

Often there is a tale, a mournful one, too, of poverty and distress, after the beloved head of a family is removed, causing trials only inferior to the actual loss of the object who was the only stay of their life.

But not so here; for Andrew was exact and punctual in all his affairs, and he had provided against want with a care and forethought which it would be wise for every man to imitate as far as possible. His will had been made on the very day on which he had first felt within him the seeds of death, and as far as human foresight could arrange, there was nothing for the bereaved wife to do, but to live on in her accustomed way with her children, and old Elsie Cameron, who had long made her only home with the Murrays. And when the memory of the dead became softened in the lapse of years, there was even happiness in that quiet household. The mother did not forbid her daughters' participation in the pleasures and amusements natural to their age; and there were few hearts that were not deeply interested in the two orphan children of a man widely known and generally beloved like Andrew Murray. They had grown up to womanhood with their distinctive traits growing stronger and deeper—Agnes still peaceful and serene, diffusing calm and quietude wherever her presence fell, like the soft waving of the dove's wing—Helen growing more passionate as she came out from the brooding peace of her own home, and mingled more with the world.

To their quiet, sea-side town, there came one summer an unusual number of strangers. They who had been there before, induced many of the rambling tourists of the season to accompany them thither, and among the crowd came Norman Ross, a rich Southerner now, but of old, only of moderate fortune. He had emigrated South at a period when fortunes fell like rain upon those who would risk most to obtain them; and he risked all but honor, and won the prize. People said he had come to the North to carry off a New England bride, in preference to wooing the luxurious and indolent Southern dames. Be that as it might, it was not long before the individual bride herself was pointed out in the person of Helen Murray. That she favored him none could doubt. The pride which had hitherto kept all other suitors at a distance, vanished before the hope of winning Norman Ross. Not that she loved him, for she had not come to that point yet. But such a conquest would be grateful to her ambition, and moreover, her intellect would be satisfied with such a companion. Some thought it would be hard to say which of the sisters was the attraction, but all agreed that it lay in Mrs. Murray's house, and would end in his becoming her son-in-law. Agnes, ever looking at her sister's interest more than her own, persuaded herself and her mother, that Helen was the one sought, and she managed always to have them alone if possible, or to busy herself with something that required her at the farthest window of the little parlor where Norman Ross seemed to spend the most of his time. If a look of impatience followed her retreating figure, no one saw it, for Helen's eyes were cast down with ill concealed triumph.

"How can I make Agnes understand that it is she that I wish to see?" was his daily question to himself. "I cannot tell her so in the presence of her sister, and Helen never leaves the room." And all the time Helen was wondering that the declaration did not come, which she thought was trembling on his tongue; and she grew more and more gracious.

The season was waning, and many were leaving the sea-side for more sheltered quarters, but Norman Ross still lingered. The change brought him more frequently to Mrs. Murray's house, and she had begun to like the really true-hearted and companionable young man, whose society enlivened them all so much. Helen, never very communicative, said nothing of her own hopes, and Agnes was equally silent. One evening Mr. Ross announced his intention of leaving the next day. The news was received by Helen with surprise and disappointment, for she had fully expected him to say something about an engagement before he went; and now it was the last evening of his stay. It was late when he rose to depart. He went up to Mrs. Murray's chair, and bade her adieu. Some emotion seemed to possess him which he could not conquer. At last, he spoke:

"I may as well tell you, my kind friend, what has happened to me, since my idle, rambling life commenced. My partner at the South has absconded, and I am a beggar, or nearly one, I suppose. I tell you this, so that you may not think of me again as a rich man."

"Believe me, Mr. Ross," said Mrs. Murray, "that no change could alter you in my eyes. Our friendship for you did not grow out of your wealth, nor can the loss of it do anything but strengthen it. For yourself, I am truly sorry, and trust that all is not lost, and that you will regain at least a competency."

He bowed his thanks, and turned away to where Helen was sitting. Poor Helen! old Elsie's prophecy was beginning to work for her instead of Agnes, for already a storm was in her heart that could not be dissipated in any sun that might shine. She felt mortified at the evident encouragement she had given to Ross; for not a particle of true, unselfish love had been its source. Almost formally she returned his good-by clasp. Agnes was the last, and she had tears in her eyes. Perhaps a suspicion of the truth darted across his mind, for she gave him her hand far more cordially than she had ever done before. A gleam of joy lighted up his features; and for a moment he was almost tempted to tell her what he had hitherto felt in regard to her.

"But no," he said to himself, "I will never ask her to wed my poverty. Ah, now comes the sting. And yet," he added, musingly, "it would be worth the experiment to know which would accept me now." He looked at Helen who had sunk back, cold and stately—it was only for a moment—he drew Agnes to the door. "Tell me, Miss Murray, if your sister—if you think I have shown her too much attention?" He spoke quickly, almost wildly.

"I have no right to tell you her thoughts, Mr. Ross. For myself I can answer. You have shown her sufficient to entitle her to an explanation."

"She shall have it," he answered. "Go to her, will you, and say that I wish to speak to her alone."

Agnes opened the door of her own little conservatory near, and promised to send her sister. "Go to him, Helen," she said, "and perhaps you will comfort him in his misfortune."

Helen's lip took a scornful curve, but she went in, and received his cold, calm offer of marriage. He was rejected, and his heart told him it was because of his poverty. He received his refusal with as chilling an air as her own. They came out together, and Helen escaped up stairs without a single word. He went back to the room where Agnes was sitting. Her mother had retired, and she sat there, musing, in the dim light of a small lamp, and the imperfect fire light, for it was a chilly evening, and required the warmth of a fire.

She started when he came in alone, but tried to smile, and said, half gaily, "May I greet you as a brother or not?"

He sat down by her and told her all, from the beginning up to that very hour when he had offered his hand to Helen. "I would have married her when my fortunes should have changed," he said, "and she should never have known that she was not my first and only choice. I know what you must think of my doing so; but I believe it was the best way. I was, however, almost perfectly sure that my misfortunes would alienate her. Now she cannot complain, because she has chosen her own course. I am free. Tell me, then, if when I regain my wealth, I may hope to prosper my cause with you, now that you know all I have experienced."

Agnes looked up, all radiant with tears. "If indeed he had loved her first, and her sister's interests would not suffer, she would bind herself to him now. Wealth nor poverty should ever be a question with her. She would glory in the love that could not bestow aught but itself upon her."

And so the contract was made that bound the two together. Helen knew all the next day. Apparently there was no pang followed the announcement, and that evening saw her flirting with young Sherwood, who was both rich and handsome, while Agnes gave herself up to the new joy of being beloved, even though she had parted, perhaps for a long time, with Norman Ross.

His first letter arrived early after his departure. His affairs were not so much involved as he expected. With the second, came the news that nearly the whole had been refunded by an act of sudden penitence, occasioned by a severe illness on the part of the offender. Helen's face turned crimson, and her eyes flashed, when this was told by Agnes; but the happy girl saw it not. She believed that Helen's heart was given to young Sherwood, and that her attentions to Ross were only to cover her attachment to the other.

But Helen could bear it no longer. She burst out into an indignant storm of passion, accused Agnes of treachery and double dealing, and taunted her with the preference of Norman Ross for herself. Altogether, a scene most unworthy of a sister was enacted, and the heart of Agnes was wounded to the quick by her unjust imputations, although she answered her with as much gentleness as she could command.

There was an unwilling listener to this conversation. Unknown to either, young Sherwood had been shown into the next room, and heard what forever deterred him from engaging himself to Helen Murray.

The home of Agnes is in the sunny south, where her sweetness and goodness form its best charm to her husband. Helen received with coldness every invitation to visit them; and when her mother passed a winter with Agnes, Helen went to visit a friend, to spend the time until she returned.

"You saved me from ruin, Agnes," said Norman to his wife, the only time which the subject was ever mentioned after their marriage. "I should infallibly have taken to evil courses, had I a wife like your sister."

And Agnes so earnestly implored that he would not judge her too harshly, that he dropped the subject forever, thankful that the angel of peace brooded over his home.

Does Helen live unmarried? No; for her beauty gained her a lover, and his wealth supplies her every whim. As the world goes, she is a very tolerable wife to a husband who cares little for his home, and finds more congeniality among his boon companions, than in the calm sunshine of domestic peace. But to this day, she has not forgiven Agnes for marrying Norman Ross. Elsie died many years ago; leaving her prophecy for Agnes unverified.

SHIP-BUILDING EXTRAORDINARY.

It is clear, says Punch, that ship-building is merely in its cradle. The Yankees are determined not to be out-reached by the Leviathan. We are informed that, at New York, they are building a ship so tremendously long that there is no part of the ocean sufficiently broad to enable it to turn. This difficulty is to be obviated by the ship having two wheels—one on the American end, the other on the English. The passengers will simply have to walk across. Long before you have had time to stroll from one wheel to another you will be at your journey's end. There will be cabstands at various points, for the convenience of those who cannot keep up with the speed of the vessel. An omnibus will also start at the commencement of each trip. It guarantees to reach the other extremity of the vessel precisely at the same time that the vessel touches at the desired harbor. For the accommodation of pedestrians, persons going from England to America are requested to keep on the right hand side of the vessel, whilst passengers walking from the American continent to the European are directed to go on the left. There are to be shops on both sides all the way. The mere rent of these is expected to pay for the outlay of the building. The ship is not yet christened, but it is expected that, out of compliment to the Yankees, it will be called the Stretcher.

GERMAN EMIGRATION.—Every day brings to light some new proof of the effects produced on the population of Germany by the extensive emigration which has been going on for some years. The most recent instance has occurred in the district around Elberfeld. When the allotted contingent of recruits was called out, it was found that of 1300 of the male population, reported for service, not more than 95 made their appearance, and these, upon examination, were found to be unfit for military duty.

Many speak the truth, when they say that they despise riches and preferment, but they mean the riches and preferment possessed by other men.

THE BONNIE BLACK EYE.

BY DR. FRED. HOUCK.

O, I care not for pain or for sorrow,
 They'll pass like the clouds soon away—
 For the sun may shine bright on the morrow,
 Though shrouded in darkness to day.
 Then away with the gloom dark as night,
 And let joy and pleasure draw nigh,
 For the heart is illumined by the light
 That beams from thy bonnie black eye.

And if still by hard fate I am driven,
 Through paths that are darksome and dread,
 O, that beam, like the Iris of heaven,
 Will renew the bright hopes that had fled.
 Then away with all grief and all pain,
 And gloom from this bosom shall fly—
 And the heart will reflect back again
 The beams from thy bonnie black eye.

Though the world should prove false and unkind,
 If thou look kindly on me,
 Earth's troubles would pass like the wind,
 I'd think but of joy and of thee.
 Then away with dull sorrow and care;
 But still the breast yields up a sigh,
 For I feel there is something to fear
 From the glance of thy bonnie black eye.

I ask not for worldly called pleasures—
 I ask not in story to shine;
 But what's richer to me than earth's treasures,
 I ask this—that thou wouldst be mine.
 Then, O soon would this heart be at rest,
 And its joy with angels would vie—
 For of mortals I'd be the most blest,
 With her of the bonnie black eye.

THE INVISIBLE ARTIST:

— OR, —

THE QUADROON SLAVE.

BY MARTHA WHORTLEY BENTON.

THE castle of Otranto was situated among the most delicious scenes of Southern Greece. It was a bold ruin—a landmark whose veteran towers told a tale of other years, and with its fountains, lawns and galleries, was unmatched, grand and venerable.

Oswald, the primal hero of our story, was the last heir to these veteran towers, the doted-upon and only child of Sir Censtans Cremorne. He was haloed by that golden crescent which wealth throws about its proteges, and long descended from the patriotic and noble-born, and the fond father saw in the future a brilliant and starlit career for this pride of his life. It was, indeed, sufficient to gladden any parent's heart. And with his deep bright eyes, his classic mouth, and beautifully-moulded head, crowned with an infinity of soft fair ringlets, could any mother but fold him to her heart and shut away all that was discordant with the peace of his early years?

Overpassed that rosy lawn that lays so smiling and enchanted between the cradle and the university, our hero began to manifest those attributes which so eminently characterized him in after years. Poetic, passionate, keenly alive to the beautiful, proud, and a little bit of a tyrant withal, he was a worthy scion of so venerable a stock.

A few years tuition among the master spirits of literature and elegance gave what Sir Censtans considered the coup de grace to his noble son; and Oswald, ever restless for adventure, and at restraint, essayed a pilgrimage to the ruin, the hollow cave, the steep, crowned with the cypress and the olive, and hallowed by battle memories of the past.

In travelling far to the north of Greece, across the limpid waters of the Golden Horn, and through the classic dells of the Drave and the Danube, there flitted before his vision one of those types of perfection which haunt the poet's dream, and live in the painter's ideal, and flourish in freedom throughout that morning land, that Valley of Sweet Waters, which gives the East its fitness for an Eden.

This Haidee, which overturned the ambitious schemes of young Cremorne, he first saw as she sported with her gazelle among the fountains, graceful in every gliding motion, and musical in every light laugh that echoed, in her sports, from faultless lips slightly parted, in their ruby richness, like the cleft of a pomegranate blossom. There was a deep magic in her sparkling eyes, so oriental and so deep, and in the exuberant folds of raven hair that fell around her neck with a adding much to the languid beauty of her passionate eye, and this, combined with a form Praxiteles would have worshipped, wrought Oswald to ecstasy.

"Grace beyond the reach of art,"

Though the incautious youth, springing to her side to breathe out his enrallment, was shut out from the fair face by the veil that modesty drew before her features, and he saw the fairy disappear, with her drapery floating in the wind, like a cloud around a statue—though the first prelude was quite unsuccessful in its completion, yet he had the satisfaction, ere long, to feel confident of the spell he exerted over this "bird of paradise," and in perfect freedom they flirted together, thinking only of each other, of the present—not of the past or the future.

The oft-written epistles, which had formerly sped away to Otranto castle, were now discontinued entirely; and the ready brain, and the willing pen, were only occupied now in celebrating this "Tulip Cheek." Even to the confidential fellow-traveller, the intimacy was not confided. Solemn, sweet and secret it existed, until it grew into genuine love—that mysterious union of soul and sense in which the lowliest dew-drop reflects the image of the brightest star.

Leila, for such this oriental beauty was named, was sequestered among the wealth and magnificence of one of the nabobs of the East, to whom our hero had been presented and recommended. The infatuation had so rapidly grown between the two new friends, Leila and Oswald, and the honeyed draught of rapture so intoxicating to the latter, that he had not stopped to inquire into the ties that bound the fair inamrata to his host; that she existed, and called him sire, sufficed.

Morrelli was a stern man, and his eye kindled at any humiliation of his dignity; yet he seemed to be fully aware how great an ornament the graceful Leila afforded to his establishment, and no pains had been spared to mould her in accordance. She played the harp, was the first in the dance, and the sweetest-voiced of all the damsels that warbled by the Danube.

At length Oswald dreamed out his unreal dream, in which but a temporary link seemed to bind their hearts with a silken tie, and he thirsted to claim her, entirely, supremely, irrevocably his, and only his.

Morrelli had long looked upon this amour as inexpedient and wayward, and by indifference and sternness made our hero understand his primitive right to dictate the beautiful Leila. Here Oswald betrayed his devotion and enthralment, and meeting with scorn and defiance, persuaded Leila secretly to fly with him, become his bride, and share his fortune, promising that he would lay his heart and life at her feet to serve her; and at length their love was consummated by that binding vow that binds two hearts together, never to be separated without severing the vital cords of each.

And then Oswald, for the first time, realized his true position. He had scarcely breathed the fragrance of twenty summers, and Leila was plucking the roses of her fifteenth. He was without any fixed principles of life, and he was no longer to please himself alone, but must also be the protector and the guiding star of one younger than himself, beautiful, erring and frail. He knew the great hopes that, as the "heir of Otranto," were built up upon him, and this liaison of his, he felt, had rendered him unworthy, and it galled his pride. Morrelli, too, commenced in threatening terms to upbraid him for his presumption; and, with his beautiful Leila, he fled to Venice, and, ingenious and versatile, and nerved to energy at thought of his fair bride, he entered the studio of an eminent artist, determined to sooner die than call upon his father.

At length the love of Oswald and Leila is crowned with life's deepest, purest joy; their united lives have reappeared in a new existence, and they feel that without this rich experience, the human heart can never know one half its wealth of love.

Lesandro (for so it was Oswald's fancy to name their boy, in commemoration of an old ballad) was of a lighter brown than Leila in complexion, but rich and glowing as an autumnal leaf. The iris of his large dark eye had the melting, mezzotinto outline, which gives so plaintive and languishing an expression. He was flexible in form, and graceful as an antelope; and in the warm atmosphere of father's and mother's love, he grew like a flower open to the sunshine.

We need not tell what commotion and chagrin was felt in the Grecian home at Otranto, when the youthful folly of our hero was made known. Sir Constans was haughty and defiant, at first, and then there came a yearning towards his second life; and he travelled into the East, to learn from the fountain-head the humiliating tale of Oswald's infatuation. Some startling facts were gathered, in this quarter, respecting the birth and descent of the beautiful Leila, and armed with these, Sir Constans prepared to wrest home again the heart of his noble son.

Meanwhile, Oswald was advancing in his new employment to a great degree of perfection; while Leila and Lesandro adorned his cottage home, and offered to his heart and to his pencil the ideals of love and beauty.

Ten years of happiness had now passed over the head of Oswald, and then the scene changed. The ambition, which had characterized Sir Constans, seemed to have been transferred to the son; an enemy had been at work, and he who so late had been hedged about with love's tenderest guardianship, now spurned at its solicitude.

The name of Oswald Cremorne already stood high in the world of art, and each day was adding some new triumph to his exertions. But he grew careless of his home; and though the light in Leila's eyes was just as fond and bright, and the guileless heart as warm, yet discord prevailed where harmony once reigned. The love claspings of the darling child were less frequent, the regretful lingering, ere the farewell was taken, almost forgotten. Sir Constans had been at work—selfish of the idolatry of Oswald with other images than the parent heart could offer.

Leila was the daughter of an African slave who had, likewise with her child, borne the palm for beauty. She was the property of Morrelli, and when she laid her own life down to give existence and beautiful aspiration to her child, Morrelli placed it among the fountains and gazelles, reared it with tenderness, and loved it as his own. But there yet remained that curse upon her brow—the glowing tinge—the curse of Cain. It was of course a profound secret to Oswald, and when Sir Constans insinuated the whole, he denied the possibility.

“’Tis false—a base fabrication to effect the purposes of a tyrant!” he exclaimed, as he rose from his easel, beside which the father had breathed of the unworthiness of Leila. “Another word, and you leave my studio! You have never seen her, or you could never lisp the words you now dare! And were it all true, do you suppose it could make any difference with me? You are mistaken in your son!”

But the insidious tongue had breathed out its venom, and Oswald grew restless and impatient, oftentimes gloomy, and Leila was often startled to find how searching was the gaze he rivetted on her face. Lesandro, too, seemed to have lost his power to please; he less often climbed his father’s knee, or ran by his side with glad laugh and lightsome bound, and Leila pressed him to her own bosom with a vehement love and agony that made him shudder.

Pride at length did the work. Oswald had absented himself considerably from the hearthstone where so much happiness had formerly been his lot. Often for whole nights he came not near the threshold of his home; and when once more with his wife and child, in answer to her solicitude and caress, his dogged answer was “of some pressing engagement in his studio, or new dream image to be portrayed, requiring application and solitude.”

One night, left alone through all the dreary hours, Leila felt the sad forebodings that there were dark clouds passing over her life’s bright sky; and as she listened to the still breathing of her beautiful boy, she pondered on the strange, wild conduct of his father—of her dear Oswald. Long into the dread, silent midnight she waited, and listened for his footstep; and as he came not, she bent her head low, and covering her face with her hands, gave way to the pent-up agony which her neglected heart had so long stifled. Sleep, that comforting friend of the heart broken and disconsolate, at length hushed the low sobs of the lonely Leila, while dreams of her old home, of her gazelle, and her lute, made her rest a fairy Elysian of happiness.

Bright, beautiful morning was gilding the fairy land of Venice, cresting the blue waves with beauty, and lighting up the curtained apartments of the beautiful quadroom, who was startled from her slumber by the soft pressure of child arms about her neck, and moist, warm lips on hers, and again she waked to the fair, bright face of her petted boy.

“Dear mother,” exclaimed the boy, “my father was here this morning! He waked me from sleep with a kiss, but he was strange and wild, and when I sprang to caress him, he put me aside with, ‘child of a slave!’ What does it mean, mother? not that beautiful lady in the picture, with chains about her ankles and arms, and big tears in her eyes, that hangs in my father’s studio? He told me that was a slave! O, it must be dreadful, mother, to be a slave! I called him father, and he snatched his hand away from mine; but when I told him I was his own darling boy, he folded me as he used to do in the good old times when he used to stay at home with you and me. O, my father! my father!”

The passionate child buried his face in his mother’s lap, and wild with grief, made the whole air resound with his cries.

And then the horrid truth came at once to the grief-stricken Leila. What could she say to comfort her child, when her own heart was bursting? Patiently, day after day, the mother and her child waited for the return of Oswald; no greeting and no parent came. The studio was closed, the Venetian cottage desolate, and the mother and her child, who had been so loved and so caressed, were homeless, friendless and forlorn.

Troubles never come singly; and ere a month had passed over the heads of the outcasts, rough hands had been laid on the once cherished wife, and bold claims maintained to the possession of their bodies—and they were slaves!

Oswald, over-persuaded by the promises and ambitious interference of his father, and fanned by that pride which was stronger than affection (as well as threatened by the tyrannical father of Leila, who was likewise her master and her child’s), at length fled from the cottage, the love-nest of many happy years, from the arms of one whom he had chosen from all the world beside, from the fond caresses of their beautiful child, and was deemed, as of old, the manly, the handsome, and the noble heir of the noble house of Otranto.

Courted and canonized for his perfection in the art of picture-poetry, and so gallant, how Oswald was fawned upon and preferred! Reminiscences of his once-loved Leila kept all vague ideas of feminine attachment for some time in check, until so often had the attentions of the great painter been elicited, that his vanity became aroused, and Leila and Lesandro became unwelcome intruders in his thoughts. And silken ringlets of the brightest gold, and blue eyes, to which the violet was harsh now, shone—love-tokens for the wealthy and popular, and laid on the same breast where tresses dark as night, and eyes dreamy, shadowed and darkling, had once wept and smiled; and here, for a brief space, allow us to leave the great Cremorne, and over the boundary of other lands, amid very different scenes, seek the welfare of Leila and Lesandro.

Back, amid the old scenes of girlhood, pleasure and maiden love, ere cruel Fate, which had been born with her, had ever been allowed to darken her bright years, the mother and her child were borne. She pined in heart, and made loud lamentation for the being she had so loved, and when they told her of the marriage of Oswald, the life-blood in her heart stood still, and she folded it away within her, in loneliness, misery and despair. Fate had decreed a separation between the mother and child, though Leila exerted herself to the utmost to preserve her beautiful boy to herself, as the last remnant of that other life she had led, so brief and so blissful, and of him who had turned its bright pages for her; but it seemed inexorable, and distance divided the mother and her lovely and loving child.

Several years had now passed over the characters of our story, and in the studio of one of the greatest painters in Venice several students were engaged at their easels—all of them bright-eyed and bold-browed, as geniuses are generally. The materials and the morceaus, which characterized the detail of their wonderful art, lay in graceful confusion in all parts of the room, and as they plied the pencil, the following unique conversation circulated:

"So the great maestro is to visit us! Signor Angelique will have to apply himself somewhat, methinks, to finish that extraordinaire, he has plotted so deep, to be able to present it to my lord! A worthy chef d'œuvre of so talented and popular an artist! What think you, Sebastian, of signor's 'Descent from the Cross?' The arms of the beloved disciple seem rather extended, in my opinion."

"Hush, Francois! senor will overhear—and you know his petulance!" exclaimed the one addressed, turning round, and casting a hasty glance at the first speaker. "He knows it as well as you do, and it makes him vexed; he spoiled the outline of my 'Beggar' this morning, out of mere nervousness. But take care, maestro! or you will blanch the cheek of your Madonna out of shade! And you remember the Ave Marias you have to weep, when carelessness is the father of mistake! What of my lord, this great critic, and the monseigneur of art, of whom all Venice stands in such awe? He is human, I suppose?"

"Ask Senor Angelique! All I know," replied Francois, "is that he once took up painting out of spite, and being rich and powerful, became the tyrant of his brotherhood. The most laudable and peerless of his productions is said to be the 'Mother and Child,' in the ducal palace, and that was by his own experience in the beautiful."

"Yes, yes!" exclaimed a smaller youth, who had not before spoken. "But that is only one half the story; Michael Steno was in the studio with him when he was painting it, and he said the original was his own wife and child, who were beautiful enough to turn even the head of an artist!"

"Really, Vincenza, you are quite an enthusiast! Let the great maestro and Signor Angelique both beware of a rival. But hold! here comes monseigneur!"

Signor Angelique was a tall, dark man, with piercing black eyes, and, from all outward appearance, proud and bigoted. At his entrance, the merry gossip of the students ceased, and each one profoundly bowed, as he entered. After surveying the several endeavors of his students, he walked to his own easel, and removing the shading drapery, regarded it for a moment with a searching look, and then turning suddenly upon Francois, exclaimed:

"Which of you has dared to piece out my imperfection with your own light and shade?"

"Surely it is none of us, I can answer," replied Francois, as he looked upon the graceful akimbo arms of the Apostle John, which the maestro had left awkward and unfinished.

"Then I must have corrected en sonambula. Andy, bring my palette and brush! It is time I had put the finishing touch here."

At this command, a youth of fourteen summers made his appearance from behind a screen where the tools of the studio were bestowed. He was eminently handsome, slender, and dark-eyed; and with a melancholy radiance in his dark features, which was as unusual as his motions were graceful, he glided to the side of Angelique, performed his bidding, and again disappeared to resume his occupation.

The maestro said but little; but the conversation of the young students was particularly rife with anticipation of the criticisms their creations were soon to undergo. And after several hours of application, as the day faded into twilight, they one by one folded up their endeavors. Angelique was the last to leave his task, giving the boy Andy double charge to be upon his guard lest the same invisible artist, who had taught him the lesson the previous day, should strew more colors over his chef d'œuvre during the coming night.

So, day after day, the young students and their morose tutor labored and conversed—the workmanship of Angelique always presenting a different phase of beauty, and a nearer degree of perfection in the morning, than he left upon it at night. Irritated and nonplussed, he harangued his pupils and suspected and belied them all.

"To-night, Andy, I forbid your retiring at all," exclaimed the artist, as he once again prepared to leave. "To-morrow I must add the last touch to my masterpiece, and prepare my studio for the reception of our honored guest, Monseigneur Cremorne! and should the invisible again ply palette and brush, my wrath will be unconquerable. And on your vigil it depends. Mind, now! don't be caught napping, on your peril!"

The boy received these commands in silence, and again the door of the studio was locked.

"Francois," exclaimed the artist Sebastian, as they loitered on the threshold of the gallery, "Angelique is anxious about the phantom of the night that haunts his studio and teaches him such errors in his art. For our own gratification, let us watch with the boy Andy to-night! To-morrow is a great day for Angelique, remember."

"Well, well! anything that suits your fancy. So here goes."

It was midnight in the studio of the painter Angelique. Sebastian and his friend Francois laid perdu in the antechamber; and the boy Andy, entirely unconscious of their presence, was stretched, half asleep, on the carpet. The clock struck one, and the boy started up as if alarmed that he had dared to slumber. He took from his breast a crucifix, and kneeling down, bent his head over it in the most reverential manner. Then rising to his feet, he grasped the taper and the palette, and casting a searching glance around the apartment, removed the covering from Angelique's chef d'œuvre, and scanning it for a brief moment, began to trace a halo around the Saviour's head, to tinge the limbs more perfectly, and with the taste of an artist, to complete the picture. The clock struck four, and again the youth started. The palette was put away, the light extinguished, and the boy shrunk away behind his screen silently and unseen. Francois and Sebastian looked at each other with astonishment; but they placed their fingers on their lips and withdrew, hardly acknowledging to themselves the wonder they had discovered in the invisible artist.

It was morning in the studio of Senor Angelique Lioni. Earlier than usual, the maestro and his pupils had resumed their preparations for their honored guest. With an eager hand, Lioni dashed away the drapery from his easel, seized the brush, when lo! the most perfect and finished picture was presented, that ever adorned his gallery. He was bewildered! Seizing Francois by the arm, he drew him before the tableau, exclaiming:

"By St. Mark! the heavens help me! The invisible artist again! Summon the boy Andy, and threaten to cut out his tongue, if he reveals not this mystery. But make way! here comes monseigneur!"

Upon this, Oswald Cremorne, the courted and polished friend of art, and man of taste, entered with a courtly bow; and after examining the creations of the pupils of Lioni, and bestowing much commendation, proceeded to the long-cherished masterpiece of their master.

"You well deserve the praise I have heard bestowed upon your brother!" exclaimed the delighted Cremorne. "This is assuredly matchless! I should think an angel must have guided your pencil in those fine touches which give the exquisite expression to the features! But as you know its perfections, what need to praise!"

"And so I think our holy mother did grant me aid!" returned Angelique. "I have no recollection of gilding those rays of glory, or plating that crown of thorns; but if such angel visitant came here, none knows of it save the boy Andy. Where are you, boy? If you have seen any white-browed dignity at my easel, come reveal!"

Trembling in every limb, the terrified boy made his appearance; but he did not speak. Cremorne looked at the youth's bright eyes, and a film for a moment came across the clear vision of the noble man. The boy, too, ~~was~~ ^{was} stricken with pallor; but terrified at the fierce command and rough grasp of his master, he ~~clung~~ ^{clung} his deep eyelids and again he hesitated and faltered in his speech.

"Give the boy fifty lashes for his doggedness!" exclaimed Lioni, wrought up to a perfect frenzy of vexation.

Here Francois and Sebastian came to his relief, and in a few brief words, explained the wonderful talent and singular conduct of the invisible artist.

"Down on your knees, Lesandro, and beg pardon of my lord for your presumption!" ("Impudent fool!" exclaimed Angelique, aside, as the suppliant knelt at Cremorne's feet.)

"Ask gold, Lesandro!" exclaimed Francois.

"Ask to be received as a pupil into our studio!" preferred Sebastian.

"Ask for your freedom!" whispered Vincenza in the poor boy's ear.

And here the electric chord was touched. He raised his hands, and letting his head fall upon his breast, faltered:

"The freedom of my mother! I am the child of a slave."

Oswald Cremorne bit his lip, as he raised up the prostrate suppliant. He asked of him his name, his birth and memories.

Believing the reader can find the mysterious link that bound the nobleman and the boy-slave into father and son more gracefully than we can portray it, allow us to drop the curtain over the studio of Angelique Lioni, and shift the scene to the emancipation of the life servitude, of the pent-up feelings of broken hearts, and of the freed spirits, to better worlds.

"Mother, mother, you are free—you are free—and I am no longer a slave!" were the glad, dear words that broke from the lips of the boy, as half frantic with joy, he sprang into her arms. "And see—he is come back! I told you he would. Ah, he did not forget Leila and Lesandro."

Less beautiful Leila might have become since Oswald last turned away in scorn from her tenderness; but as she sprang with a glad, wild scream of joy to his breast, he only saw her the same pure, bright gazelle she appeared when his boy-heart first greeted her among the roses in the Valley of Sweet Waters. And all the past of joy, bliss and sorrow, passed in quick review before him.

His noble boy knelt beside him, while his darling Leila, pressed fondly to his heart, still better recalled that moment of triumph when, with his eager, poet eyes and his artist's pencil, he created on the canvass the masterpiece of the ducal palace—"The Mother and her Child." Exquisite of happiness, the other partner of his bosom, wooed in ambition, he had long before laid to sleep among her native hills and waters, and he only dreamed now, with Leila and Lesandro, "to remount the river of his years" and live in an Eden of his own creating.

He bent low his head to whisper of hope, of life and love in the ears of the broken-hearted; but the transition from despair to delight had been too much for the beautiful quadron, and the pure, warm heart was pulseless within the frame where it had quivered, thrilled and overflowed. Under a spreading tree beside the Venetian cottage, with a small white cross at her head, twined with the cypress vine, Leila the quadron slave was buried, and Lesandro and monseigneur often lingered long with memory at her grave.

No longer the child of a slave, Lesandro was received into the studio of the greatest artist in Venice. And as his infancy and boyhood had been sacred as his own life, so his dawning manhood and renown shed perfume on the declining intellect of Oswald, as the rose-tree hallows the decaying petals of its former sweets with the aroma of new and fresher blossoms. "The Mother and Child" was purchased and restored again to the walls of the Venetian cottage, where the last days of Oswald Cremorne were passed, and the "Descent from the Cross," by The Invisible Artist, hung for a hundred years amid the magnificence of St. Mark.

BOYHOOD OF LORD BACON.

Francis Bacon was born in the Strand, in 1651. His health was delicate; and by his gravity of carriage, and love of sedentary pursuits, he was distinguished from other boys. While a mere child, he stole away from his playfellows to a vault in St. James's Fields, to investigate the cause of a singular echo which he had observed there; and when only twelve, he busied himself with speculations on the art of legerdemain. At thirteen, he was entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, which he left after a residence of three years, "carrying with him a profound contempt for the course of study pursued there, a fixed conviction that the system of academic education in England was radically vicious, a just scorn for the trifles on which the followers of Aristotle had wasted their powers, and no great reverence for Aristotle himself.—From Timbs's School Days of Eminent Men."

DISCOVERY IN ELECTRICITY.

It has been discovered that positive electricity will extinguish the flame of a lamp, and negative electricity will increase it. When the flame of about two inches in height is charged positively, from a powerful machine, it is rapidly shortened to total extinction. When the flame is charged negatively, it is immediately enlarged, a portion of it being impelled down around the wick tube for the distance of an inch, and a portion also elongated above. This is one of the many interesting discoveries that are constantly being made in electricity.—Scientific American.

HOME IS SAD WITHOUT A MOTHER.

BY H. D. L. WEBSTER.

Home is sad without a mother!
 Gloom and darkness hover there;
 Eyes of childhood, wet with weeping,
 Speak of sorrow and despair.
 "Kiss me, sister! love me, brother!"
 O home is sad without a mother!

Home is sad without a mother!
 Mouldering yonder in the tomb,
 Hands we've often felt caressing
 Silken curls in childhood's home.
 "Kiss me, sister! love me, brother!"
 O home is sad without a mother!

Home is sad without a mother!
 Vacant is the "old arm chair;"
 Lips of love are cold and silent—
 Silent in the church-yard there.
 "Kiss me, sister! love me, brother!"
 O home is sad without a mother!

Home is sad without a mother!
 Up there in the spirit land,
 Father, mother, sister, brother,
 Form a circle, hand in hand.
 "Kiss me, sister! love me, brother!"
 O angel home, where dwells sweet mother!

THE DUKE'S BRIDE.

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

THE grand drawing-rooms of the Palais Royal were a-blaze with splendor and echoing with all the gayety of the court, for the Regent, Anne of Austria, gave this night a ball at which all the beauty and nobility of the court were assembled. The little king, Louis XIV., still a boy, in a magnificence of royal array, stood on his dais floor receiving the guests with the dignity of an older person, and his mother, her beauty yet unimpaired, and enhanced by gorgeous jewels, sat at her proud ease with the crafty Cardinal Mazarin standing by her side. The beautiful Duchess de Longueville, the Prince Conde, the intriguing M^{de} Chevreuse, the Cardinal de Retz, with a hundred others whose names are familiar as household words, all mingled in the crowd, beneath whose light airs and merriment lay that keen wakefulness and wary scheming characteristic of a French throng in all ages. More conspicuous than any courtier in the dazzle of a rich uniform, and the haughty height of a superb figure, was the young Duke of Guise, and being so nearly related to the reigning family, every motion of his, both here and elsewhere, was closely observed. He was but lately returned from the campaign, and the marriageable beauties of the court were alert to obtain the first glimpse of his countenance, or the first mark of his favor. It was a handsome face that overlooked the throng so seriously, although beardless—soft, olive skin, dark eyes and hair, fine features with a somewhat scornful turn of the mouth, and the martial fire of his ancestor, Henry of Navarre, flashing from his eyes—and so, perhaps, thought not a few of those who, floating here and there, suffered their glances to follow the wandering figure. He had roamed through several rooms of the imposing suite, without finding anything to arrest his regard, when, moving aside to admit the entrance of another party, his eye was caught by what appeared a miracle of beauty, and he paused gazing as if spell bound. A lady past the prime of life, yet still preserved by friendly embonpoint, very sumptuously dressed, preceded, leaning on the arm of a marquis whom he knew, and followed by one apparently her daughter. The last was in the first glow of her youth, more lovely than there are words to say; tall, slender, and passing fair, she needed no ornaments to increase her beauty, and accordingly wore none but the clasps of frosted silver that bound her classic and snowy robe upon her pearly shoulders. Loads of golden hair perpetually striving to break forth in curls were caught back into a Grecian knot fastened by an arrow in whose head glittered a priceless diamond; and a skin of delicate brilliancy, large, sunny, blue eyes, radiant smiles hovering round a cherry mouth, presented a masque of beauty. The simplicity of her costume was the perfection of art, the gentle ease of her manner, the low melody of her laugh, the grace of every motion, all bespoke an exquisite cultivation, while the duke confessed to himself that purity and truth were throned on the clear brow.

"We are late, Gabrielle," said the elder lady, as they passed. "The cardinal is already surrounded, it will be impossible to speak with him concerning M. du Pons, to-night."

"It is quite as well," he heard the most musical voice in the world reply, and he turned to follow it.

As he would have advanced, De Retz caught his arm, and being delayed by his witty catechism he lost them entirely, but on entering the inner room saw Gabrielle standing beside the queen, who was bestowing upon her the special honor of a conversation without sneers. He hastened to approach, that it might be incumbent on Anne of Austria to present him to her fair companion, but as he drew near, the Queen Regent, breaking off her affable smile, said:

"Another time, my dear," motioning her away, and in turn delayed the duke till Gabrielle had become indistinguishable.

"Madame, you are generous," he said, "it is only royal beauty that can afford to share its dazzle with such as Mademoiselle Gabrielle."

"You know her?" cried the queen, taken unawares. "Yes, she is indeed beautiful; we intend her for the bride of our good M. du Pons." But glancing quickly round for Mazarin, who spoke apart with the marquis, she added as if fearful of committing herself, "At least, that is M. du Pons's wish." Yet here the crafty queen saw in the quiet wonder of her auditor's face that she was blundering, and anxious to extricate herself, exclaimed, "It is no state affair, that is, it is not a matter of policy at all—"

"Madame, it is not necessary to inform me of your majesty's intentions regarding the dowry of your ladies," said the duke, bowing low, and willing to depart, but the regent at once opened a less delicate topic, and detained him till the cardinal required her attention.

Stepping down, the duke sought round vainly for the lady, and at last entered the dancing hall, where the gallant young king was just opening the ball by leading out as his partner, Mlle. Gabrielle. The duke advanced through the hall, and when the graceful sport was concluded, the king led his partner to a seat near him.

"It is the duke," cried he, springing forward to embrace him, but remembering himself, only extended both hands, exclaiming, "You are returned, M. de Guise. You have had great success, my cousin. You are a hero such as Francis. Navarre lives again in you, they tell me. I thank you. Mlle., you should know his grace, my very good friend, he is a victor, beware lest he conquer your heart." And with all the naivete of an artless child, the boy performed the very ceremony which his mother had wished should not be done at all.

It was soon easy to escape from the hall to the balcony, from the balcony to the conservatory, to linger hours in the mazes of the latter place, to increase momentarily his acquaintance with the beautiful being on his arm, to feel himself the slave of her fascination, to open before her the stores of his vivid memory and imagination, and on resigning her to her chaperone, to be convinced that the rumored marriage with M. du Pons was not a thing desired by her. The next day's call upon Mlle. Gabrielle and her mother was only a matter of courtesy, and when it was repeated, the circumspect parent saw how much grander would be the Duchess de Guise than Madame du Pons, and the queen and cardinal soon felt that madame was not so urgent for the marriage as she had been, and immediately discovered it as the effects of the duke's frequent visits. To-day they rode together in the public gardens, Guise and Gabrielle, to-morrow they sat side by side in the theatre, again they floated in sumptuous barges down the evening Seine, or danced in the salons of the noblesse, yet not once had the queen, though perfectly aware of their companionship, been able to surprise them together. In so close an intimacy as this now existing, while the fall and winter months slipped away, no wonder if between the charming girl and the young martial hero something very like love sprung up, though still unconfessed. For the marriage of Gabrielle with M. du Pons, there were a hundred reasons, the chief one being that M. du Pons desired it, and M. du Pons was so immensely wealthy that his least smile was worth a principality, and he had moreover promised the queen a gift amounting to some millions of francs if her friendly agency succeeded in bestowing on him this bride. Gabrielle was to a certain degree a favorite of the powers that be, and they even believed that in so wealthy a marriage her happiness would be promoted beyond that point which any union could afford with the Duke of Guise, who, though of royal blood, was for his rank what might be called poor. Above these considerations, M. du Pons was a leader in the parliament, and his powerful influence once turned against them, in the approaching contests with the people, might be more than they could sustain, and should Gabrielle, who, from her own and her mother's benevolence, and the memory of her father, was extremely popular in her quartiere, marry with Guise, who as the grandson and image of Henry of Navarre was almost idolized over the whole city, it was impossible to tell what disasters might ensue, even to the destruction of the present dynasty. Previous to the return of Guise, Gabrielle had not shown herself averse to M. du Pons; but now it was impossible to extract a word from her in relation to him. One spring day when the sweetest of winds drove all the southern country scents into the city, and the woods were all a flame of green, the whole court deserted the palaces and prim garden walks for a fete champetre in the beautiful forests around Fontainebleau. The queen and her sons and ladies, the cardinal and his suite, and all other solemn dignitaries, did not disdain to honor the occasion, all being in the simplest apparel, save only a narrow band of gold about the brow, which as a badge of sovereignty, the queen wore. Dispersed here and there through the vast alleys and recesses of the wood, it was almost impossible to maintain a complete surveillance, yet notwithstanding, one spy and another sought the queen with desired intelligence, and at the last one she looked up, laughing, towards the cardinal, and saying :

"Now, my Lord Cardinal, Jove grasps his thunders," she gathered up her train and disappeared among the tree-boles.

A few moments rapid walking brought her to a little clearing, carpeted with the greenest turf, and shaded by immense trees, through which yellow patches of sunshine fell and illumined the scene. Across it, leaning against opposite trees, were the Duke of Guise and Gabrielle, she half shrouded in a net of ivy falling from the great boughs and transfiguring her fair face into that of a smiling wood-nymph. The duke seemed to have been speaking earnestly, and she, about to reply, paused with the smile frozen on her face, as the queen, entering, paused on the verge of the place. The duke saw the direction of her terrified eyes, and stepping to her side took her hand.

"Mademoiselle—Gabrielle! I may call you so?" he murmured hurriedly, "give me a right to protect you against what you fear. Speak quickly, tell me if this passion of mine, which you have not failed to see, offends. Do you love me? Give me some sign; speak, Gabrielle."

She slowly turned the great blue eyes, all the terror vanishing from them, and the beautiful smile beaming full upon him.

"Do I love you?" she replied. "Is it true that you ask it—do I not dream?"

"You wish it should be true? O, Gabrielle, is my love accepted—returned?"

"Do you really love me? I hardly hoped so much. Returned—can you doubt it, dear?"

"We wear, then," he exclaimed, "an armor in which we are strong against all fates."

It was impossible to say more, for the queen was drawing near, wondering at the scene whose low words and impassioned accents were inaudible to her. Her laugh turned their eyes upon her.

"What act of tragedy is it?" she cried. "Or the fate of what nation do we decide? You love solitude, mademoiselle, and your grace loves mademoiselle. But we are sorry for that, are we not, Madame du Pons, that is to be?"

The duke's eyes flashed, and with difficulty he restrained an indignant response. As for Gabrielle, after having saluted the regent, she remained without replying to her interrogatory.

"I am accustomed to be answered, Mlle. Gabrielle," said the queen.

"Your majesty's pardon," said Gabrielle, "you did not address me."

"Did I not? I will teach you that I know my subjects' titles! I gave you yours."

"No, madame."

"You are not to be the wife of the person in question?" cried the queen, angrily.

"Never, your majesty, to be the wife of M. du Pons."

The queen surveyed her in utter silence for a few moments, then without a word turned on her heel and swept away, while Guise took the trembling girl in his arms, and kissed off the starting tears. Anne of Austria hastily rejoined the cardinal, and pacing up and down the avenue where they were, detailed to him with angry gestures, the scene she had witnessed. Mazaria walked with her a few moments lost in thought. At last he said :

"If there were any disturbance here in which this troublesome fellow might be implicated, and shot or confined! But none—no war to which he can be dismissed. The war with Spain does not need him, and makes him too popular. The colonies are quiet, there is nothing—"

"Naples has revolted from her rule, at Masaniello's signal, and he is ill," said the queen, meaningly.

"Ah, that is well. Your majesty's suggestions are always apt. Your majesty is aware that an ancestor of Guise married in that kingdom. He has, therefore, Neapolitan blood. Let Masaniello die, and this hot-headed duke can claim it, to do which he will be obliged to leave Paris, and during his absence, the marriage we desire can be arranged."

"But will Masaniello die?"

The cardinal answered by a glance and a laugh, but said no more. From this day intimations were everywhere heard respecting Masaniello's failing health, of the Duke of Guise's right to the sovereignty of Naples, till the conjectures and assertions reached his own and Gabrielle's ears. Immediately the spirit he had inherited inspired him, the chivalric idea also irradiated Gabrielle, for she urged him to leave her, and go to Rome where he would be ready to declare his claim, assuring him that she was safe and capable of preserving herself so till he should inform her of his success, when she would go to him.

"I am poor," he said, bitterly, "I have to-day but four thousand gold crowns in my treasury, and shall have no more this three months, and while the cardinal keeps hundreds, there are but six gentlemen in my suite."

"But my love has the sword of Francis, and the heart of Henry, and is never poor," she said, clinging fondly to him as they parted.

He divided with her a gold coin, she retaining one piece, and promising to obey no message from him unless accompanied by the half which he took with him, and thus suddenly departing, he reached Rome unobstructed by any adverse influence from France. Meanwhile the days slipped on; there had been sufficient time for a messenger to travel post haste to the neighborhood of Masaniello and back to Paris, and for another to follow, bringing news of his sudden and unaccountable death.

"Now," thought Gabrielle, "he has plunged into the wild waters of that revolt, he is struggling for his crown." And she offered a thousand prayers for his safety and success.

No sooner was the news of the coveted death confirmed, than Gabrielle was summoned to the queen, and closetted with her during a stormy conversation on one side, and of quiet firmness on the other.

"You must be prepared this evening, and you shall not leave the palace until it is done," said the queen at last, "to sign your marriage articles with M. du Pons."

"Your majesty can require nothing of the kind from me," returned Gabrielle, "when as you are aware, my faith is already plighted to M. de Guise."

"Your faith!" sneered the queen. "Break it!"

"That is easy for your majesty to say," was the significant reply. "But not being a queen, I have no royal prerogative to do so."

Something like a blush overcame the hardness of Anne of Austria before she replied:

"But at least, Mademoiselle Gabrielle, I have never broken faith with you."

"Forgive me, madame; but you request what is impossible."

"I request nothing. I command! And obeyed I will be, or this night you shall sleep in the bastille! And remember, Gabrielle, remember on how few its doors ever unclose."

So saying the queen abruptly rose and left her alone. Hardly was the door closed when through another one Mazarin stepped cautiously along, his head bent forward on his breast, but his eyes steadily surveying the horror-stricken girl.

"O, monseigneur, save me—save me!" cried Gabrielle, springing towards him, and seizing both his hands in hers.

If there had been any pity in the man's breast, or any tender remembrance, it could not fail to have been touched by the beautiful woman entreating his protection; but his sardonic smile and hypocritical courtesy remained unaltered.

"I wish it were in my power to be of assistance to mademoiselle. May I ask her perplexity at present?"

"The bastille," she replied.

"Ah, mademoiselle, its iron doors never are unlocked, nor its thresholds twice crossed by any. Sad indeed is the lot of those who enter. Stone walls are a poor exchange for fair, free landscapes, prison fare for luxurious tables, hard jailors for friends, husbands, lovers, wives. But what has mademoiselle to think of in relation to so terrible a place?"

"You know all I can say, of what use is repetition? O, had you never any mother or sister, any one who was a woman, and whom you loved, that your great power will fail me now who need it so much?"

"You do not mean that any friend of yours is in danger?"

"Do not play with me, monseigneur."

"If mademoiselle will not explain, most certainly I can be of no service to her."

"I cannot marry M. du Pons—I do not wish to be imprisoned," she replied, clasping her hands.

"It is painful to be obliged to inform a lady that one or the other step is inevitable."

"What interest can your eminence have in my marriage?" she asked, suddenly.

"Only the interest which the king's minister must feel in his majesty's subjects."

"Then is there no hope?" she murmured in a low tone of despair.

The cardinal sat down, and remained a few moments.

"Your case touches me," said the wily dissembler. "I will do what I can, which is in fact, nothing; merely to extend the time of your decision; it would be indeed hasty to expect one final to-night. I will vouchsafe your safety with the queen, and your answer shall be given at nine to-morrow evening."

"I thank you for even that respite," she exclaimed.

"Excuse me if I remark that your movements will be watched," he added. "Should you think of escape it will be impossible, and bring certain punishment. It is a graceless task to be forced to address a lady thus, and especially one whose own mind will doubtless advise her of the wisest course. Your carriage waits." And offering her his hand he conducted her through the halls to her coach, presenting to all spectators an example of rare condescension.

Never pausing to give her distress expression,

Gabrielle bethought herself of a hundred pretexts for escape, rejecting one after another as impracticable, till reaching home she sprang unassisted up the steps, and ran to her own boudoir. Passing on her way her mother's page, a new idea possessed her; she hastily called him, and made him her confidant. He brought to her a suit of his clothes with velvet hat and feather, and short saucy cloak, and told her where horses could be obtained outside the city. She quickly bound a belt of gold inside all, stained her face with a darker but harmless wash, and though the police and all the gates were strictly ordered that no lady corresponding to her description should pass, there was nothing said concerning a page leading a red roan horse in a bridle, who accordingly issued into the fields and suburbs unquestioned, and in a few moments mounting his steed galloped away to the southeast, and speedily put night between himself and the city. But when the presence of mademoiselle was again ordered before the queen, she was not forthcoming, and after waiting an hour or two M. du Pons left her majesty and shortly returned with the mother of Gabrielle, who in great and real distress could hardly believe the regent's assurances that she was as ignorant as herself concerning the situation of her daughter.

A week passed during which the diligent search of all their emissaries was unavailing, and in which they heard that the Duke of Guise had left Rome in a fishing-boat, and with a handful of adventurers was advancing on Naples. Then came the rumors of his triumphant onset, of his entrance sword in hand, of the acclamations of the populace who received him, of his proclamation as their ruler, of his coronation, and lastly, his own letter to the cardinal, "Monseigneur, I have succeeded, and am sovereign Duke of Naples." At all this M. du Pons saw his own defeat with sorrow, perhaps, but Mazarin and the Queen Regent could have gnashed their teeth with anger had that amusement been fashionable.

But it was nevertheless true, and the Duke of Guise had already sent a secret courier with the other portion of the gold coin which he had parted with Gabrielle, to summon her to his side, since it was impossible for him to leave and join her. But week followed week, and neither did Gabrielle appear, nor was the other part of the coin returned, nor did any message from her reach him. He knew not whether she were dead or alive, or if by any means already lost in the ravenous clutch of M. du Pons. The midst of his triumph wore a funeral gloom, and he felt the derision and scorn of his two chief enemies, while the presence of the crown was still recent on his brow. Almost in despair, the sovereign of Naples despatched courier after courier to Paris, hearing only at last that she was gone. The horrible fancy that the basilisk had swallowed her possessed him; the unsettled state of his affairs alone prevented him from leaving all in her search, and finally he had so far concluded these difficulties that his absence would disturb nothing, and on the morrow he would find himself at the point of departure. Towards sunset he left his palace, and unattended by any guard, wandered along the bay shore, confident that his person was not yet sufficiently familiar to cause him to become an object of attention. As he sauntered along, a small lateen-sailboat turned the corner of the promontory, and approached the beach. The first person who leaped to the sand was a young page, saucy and gay, who swept back all his yellow curls, donned his cap anew, and tossing some scudi to the helmsman of the boat, ran up the shore, and threw himself into a chair by a table where other gallants were already assembled, with dice and long-necked flasks, deeply absorbed in some game of chance. There was something in his appearance not unfamiliar to the duke, though he found it impossible to say what, and delighted in observing him, his grace was soon seated beside him at the table.

"You are off the sea, sir?" asked he.

"Ay," was the response, "and a man is like an elongated exclamation point then, slender as a rapier, and sick as Mazzarin is of the Regent of France."

"You are from Paris, and one of the Fronde, I see."

"You are acute, sir," was the quick answer. "I should think you were a policeman."

"You are hardly banished, my pretty youth; you do not wear the guise of a formidable conspirator."

"You seem to know all concerning me, signor. I too am something of a soothsayer; let me see, what can I inform you about yourself? You, sir, make two coins out of one, which is illegal; and you have transmuted four thousand gold crowns into one sovereign one, which is necromantic; you have been poorer than you are, and if you live long enough will die one day! A fair fortune, is it not, sir? I do not wear the guise of a conspirator, you say! But I intend to wear a different Guise soon." And rising, he lifted his cap and made the duke a reverence.

Confused and amazed the latter certainly was, but probably owing to the change of costume and complexion, and from his soldierlike frankness being utterly unsuspecting, the truth and identity of the page did not flash across him, and he half turned to watch the game proceeding at the table.

"Will the signor play?" asked one of the gamblers. "Luck is against me, sir; play for me a moment, it may change it."

The duke nodded, and put down a piece of money. In a moment the page had slipped behind the adversary's chair and thrown down a broken coin against it. The duke started, bent forward curiously, saying:

"Excuse me, sir; a singular specimen, suffer me to examine it."

"You are suspicious of my currency," cried the page, as if in a sudden passion. "Be satisfied, signor, I can double it." And he threw the other half spinning down beside it.

The duke caught them up, threw down his purse for an equivalent, and crying peremptorily to the page, "Follow me!" left the astonished group, and strode quickly up the Narrow Way, through street and square till arriving at his residence; every now and then satisfying himself the page followed. A fountain played in the courtyard, the page stopped at its brink, bathing his face, and washing off apparently some stains that had embrowned it, for the skin, so bronzed a moment before, was fairer now than a lily, and he drooped his plumes lower over the brow ere he followed the duke into the apartment towards which his steps were directed.

"Now," exclaimed the duke, turning upon the page, "how came these broken crown pieces in Naples?"

"Signor," said the page, blushing like a rose, and with downcast head, "I brought them."

But as he spoke he threw the cap aside, gazing confidently upwards, and revealing the altered visage which shone full upon Guise, in all its supernal loveliness. He paused an instant, a sudden smile breaking over his countenance, and stepping forwards, he said:

"Did you bring me anything else?"

"Signor," murmured the page, "one other thing—the hand of Gabrielle."

"And I have her heart now," cried her lover, as he caught her in his embrace, and held her with a passionate, prolonged kiss. "And to what is mine, I give my kingdom. Indeed, my darling, since you will put on another Guise, this hour shall see you in a grander one, and make Gabrielle Grand Duchess of Naples."

REPENTANCE.

Repentance clothes in grass and flowers
The grave in which the past is laid.—STERLING.

THE OLD CANOE.

[The following sweet picture is from life, and though we published it nearly a year since, we again present it to our readers, taken from a London Journal. We do not wonder, as we read the musical versification, and enjoy the delicate and yet vivid truthfulness of the poem, that it should have been so extensively copied in European journals, after going the extended round of the American press. It is from the pen of our favorite contributor, Miss EMILY R. PAGE.]

Where the rocks are gray, and the shore is steep,
And the waters below look dark and deep;
Where the rugged pine in its lonely pride,
Leans gloomily over the murky tide;
Where the reeds and rushes are tall and rank,
And the weeds grow thick on the winding bank—
Where the shadow is heavy the whole day through,
Lays at its moorings the old canoe.

The useless paddles are idly dropped,
Like a sea-bird's wings that the storm hath lopped,
And crossed on the railing, one o'er one,
Like folded hands when the work is done;
While busily back and forth between,
The spider stretches his silvery screen,
And the solemn owl, with his dull "too hoo,"
Settles down on the side of the old canoe.

The stern, half sunk in the slimy wave,
Rots slowly away in its living grave,
And the green moss creeps o'er its dull decay,
Hiding the mouldering dust away,
Like the hand that plants o'er the tomb a flower,
Or the ivy that mantles the fallen tower;
While many a blossom of loveliest hue
Springs up o'er the stern of the old canoe.

The currentless waters are dead and still—
But the light winds play with the boat at will,
And lazily in and out again,
It floats the length of its rusty chain,
Like the weary march of the hands of time,
That meet and part at the noontide chime;
And the shore is kissed at each turn anew,
By the dripping bow of the old canoe.

O, many a time, with a careless hand,
I have pushed it away from the pebbly strand,
And paddled it down where the stream runs quick—
Where the whiffs are wild and the eddies are thick—
And laughed as I leaned o'er the rocking side,
And looked below in the broken tide,
To see that the faces and boats were two,
That were mirrored back from the old canoe!

But now, as I lean o'er the crumbling side,
And look below in the sluggish tide,
The face that I see there is graver grown,
And the laugh that I hear has a soberer tone,
And the hands that lent to the light skiff wings,
Have grown familiar with sterner things.
But I love to think of the hours that flew,
As I rocked where the whirls their white spray threw,
Ere the blossoms waved, or the green moss grew
O'er the mouldering stern of the old canoe.

THE DYING BETROTHAL.

BY MRS. AGNES L. CRUIKSHANK.

"O MOTHER, mother! is this our long-promised meeting? Is this the joy I have dreamed of, day and night, for the last year? Is it for this that I have prayed once more to hold you to my heart—to hear your fond blessing—to meet your loving look? O, to find you thus—sick, dying! It is too, too much! Mother, I cannot bear it."

And with a wild burst of anguish, the broken-hearted son flung himself beside the sick woman's couch, while the hot tears transparent fingers, now so fondly clasping his.

"Everard!"

He could only press the feeble fingers in reply.

'Everard, my son—my dear, only son! I know how hard this is, but it must be borne. I have long dreaded this hour for you; yet to have hinted at my state before, would merely have destroyed your pleasure, while doing you no benefit. I have long been reconciled to die—long known that it was inevitable; and though my heart would cling to earth for love of you, my boy, I murmur not at the destiny which separates us. I have known little of joy, and much of suffering, in my short life, and but for you, would gladly lay the burden down. When I am gone, let it comfort you, dear child, that never, by word or deed, have you given me one moment's pain; that your love and obedience have amply repaid me for the bitter trials I have passed through in earlier days. And now, Everard, there is one more request I have to make of you—one more promise to exact, and I shall die happy, knowing that by your last obedience you have secured your earthly happiness. Everard, will you grant your mother's dying request?"

He knelt beside her, and still holding the faded hand in his, promised to obey her wishes in all things.

It was strange to see that strong, resolute man, whom people called stern and reserved, thus changed into almost boyish weakness; but few knew what an idolizing love Everard Livingstone had cherished for his mother—that mother who, in his sight, was perfection, whose wishes he had never crossed, whose opinions he held infallible—that mother, to save whose life now, he would willingly have yielded up his own. He felt now that she must die, and the last opportunity of affording her a pleasure was eagerly seized at.

"Anything you wish, mother, only speak it; I would do anything to give you happiness, even to the destroying of all my earthly hopes."

There was a change in the countenance of the dying woman. Did she hesitate? Did she feel that it might be, even as he said, to the destruction of earthly hopes, and that she had no right to bind him by a promise? None can tell; but if such were her thoughts, there also came the prophetic knowledge, the assurance and certainty, that her judgment had not erred.

"Not for the destroying of your peace, but the ensuring of my happiness, your son, do I ask this of you, knowing that by so doing I leave one who will more than supply my place to you—who will be your friend, your companion, your trusty counsellor, your loving wife; rejoicing with you in gladness, and sharing your sorrows, all and far more to you than other mortal can, will Eva ever be. For the past two years since her father died, she has been to me even as a daughter, next only to yourself in my love, and I have sometimes thought even more anxiously loved, from her utter loneliness and clinging attachment to myself. I have watched her closely, and have found her in all things as near perfection as human nature may come; and in leaving you together, I have as anxious a care for her happiness as yours."

Everard Livingstone made no reply to his mother's address, save that when overcome with the exertion of speaking she leaned back faint and breathless on the pillow, he bent down and kissed the cheek and pressed the feeble hand, on which the coldness of death was even now stealing; and she faintly smiled, and laid her hand upon his head in blessing, while murmured words of thankfulness were on her lips. Everard saw the look, and heard the whispered thanksgiving; and not for worlds, would he have had her know the cold chill of despair which had crept into his heart at her words.

There was a little space of silence, and no sound was heard in the chamber save the heavy breathing of that stricken man as he knelt and wiped the death-damps from his mother's face; then the dying woman spoke again, and at her bidding the son called an attendant.

"Bring Miss Eva."

The woman went away and quickly returned, followed by a fair, pale girl, whose swollen eyes and tear-stained cheeks gave evidence of sorrow scarce less than Everard's.

"Let in the sunshine, Martha," Mrs. Livingstone said. And the drawn curtains flooded the chamber with a golden glory. "Eva!"

The young girl bent down and kissed the pale brow, while with convulsive energy the sick woman clasped her in her arms; then taking her hand, and signing for Everard to approach, she joined their hands together, and taking off her own marriage ring, placed it on Eva's finger.

Thus they stood—those two, who on earth had never met before, thus strangely joined together for life! And the glorious sunshine came pouring through the open casement, and shone on them in brightness, whose hearts were heavy with sorrow, and on the pale clay before them, which should know no more of sadness and sorrow—for while they thought she rested, the spirit had gone forth!

Everard raised his companion in his arms, and bore her from the room—for worn out with watching and excitement, she had fainted; and as he stooped over her, and strove to call back life and sense, he was involuntarily touched by the sweet, sad expression of the lovely face before him. He held her hands in his—those little hands, so soft and white and now so cold—and called her by her name; but when she did not move, and still lay there, looking like some fair marble image, he grew alarmed, and made redoubled efforts to restore her. Slowly, at last, she opened her eyes; but with returning sense, came the remembrance of her sorrow.

"O mother, mother!" she moaned, bitterly; "why did you not take me with you?"

Everard bent down and kissed her cheek.

"Do not grieve," he whispered; "I will be your friend now."

His own voice choked, and he went hastily from her presence; but comfort remained with sweet Eva, and wearied and worn out with grief, she soon slumbered.

This attention and gentle kindness in her betrothed, while under his own heavy affliction, was most unexpected to Eva; and she felt a happy sense of security and shelter stealing over her. Poor, unconscious Eva! enjoy your bright anticipations while you may. You do not yet know that your new friend has two natures—the cool, calm impassiveness, with which he walks abroad and mingles with his fellow-men, and which he has learned, and the deep tenderness, the warmth of kindness which is his natural inheritance, yet which early experience has taught him well to conceal. You little dream, while his kiss yet thrills on your cheek, that weeks and months will elapse ere you again behold Everard Livingstone in this endearing mood. Taught by his mother to believe him the very soul of gentleness, you are ill prepared to tremble at his frown, to shrink abashed from his look of keen, cool criticism. But I will not anticipate; enjoy your dreams while you may, poor, gentle-hearted orphan.

For three days, Everard kept watch beside his mother's coffin; on the third, I came—I, his only cousin, the nearest relative he now had in the world—and that evening, we gave the precious dust to its kindred earth.

I, who had long known Eva's attachment to Mrs. Livingstone, was not surprised that she should be too ill to follow her friend to her last home; but I thought it strange that Everard never once should ask about her. And all that long evening, while I divided my attentions between them, her name never passed his lips. Of course, at that time I knew nothing of the death-bed betrothal; nevertheless, I thought it strange that he should be so forgetful of his mother's young friend.

Late in the night, I stole again into Eva's room and found her sleeping. The night-lamp shone on some glittering object in her hand, which, as I gently took away, she made an effort to retain. It was a handsome double locket, with Mrs. Livingstone's likeness on one side; on the reverse, a miniature copy of a magnificent portrait of Everard, which his mother thought an excellent likeness. I now noticed, for the first time, the wedding-ring on Eva's finger. I knew the ring from its peculiar chasing; and having long been aware that it was my aunt's first wish to unite her son to this fair girl, I began to have some dim idea of the truth.

Eva was still too ill to come to table next morning, and Everard and I were eating our breakfast in silence when the mail came in. There were three letters for me and one for him. I laid mine down, while I finished my coffee. The warmth of my three dear little correspondents no time could cool; but my breakfast would not improve by waiting, so I took up my cup and looked at my companion. He was holding, with trembling eagerness, a letter no gentleman had ever penned—a little delicate, perfumed affair, such as has made many a strong man's heart throb to touch and ache to peruse. That it had some such effect on Everard, it needed no great penetration to detect. The color came and went in his face, his lip quivered with emotion, his hand trembled, and at last I thought I saw the tears start. I looked away then, finished my coffee, and read my own letters; then looking at him again, I saw that a great change had passed over his face. The mouth was firm set, the brows knitted, and the eyes showed determination and other feelings which I sought in vain to read. I must confess to some little feeling of awe at the change, for I had not believed my handsome cousin capable of such feelings as I then instinctively read in his countenance. That some strong passions were at work, I could not but believe; what they were, or why he was so agitated, I knew I should some time be told, for next to his mother, I had all his life been Everard's confidential friend and correspondent.

He passed the day in business with his lawyers, and we did not meet until tea-time, and then he came into the room in an undetermined way and stood looking out of the window in silence, until Eva's maid entered and said if I would wait five minutes, she would come down to tea. As the girl went out, he turned round quickly.

"I think I shall go to the city this evening, cousin; I have some business which must be attended to, and the sooner the better."

He had a cold, hard look which forbade all questioning, and I thought he looked fearfully pale.

"I am sorry you are going, for it is lonely here now for Eva and I," I said.

But at that instant her hand touched the door, and merely saying, "I will explain all to-morrow," he left the room.

Eva and I spent the evening alone, but I saw by the anxious look she cast at the door each time a servant entered, how disappointed the poor girl felt; and after we retired, she told me of their strange betrothal, and how his mother had made her give a solemn promise to be Everard's wife.

"He does not love me, that I know; and I fear, sometimes, he may love another. If so, God help us both, for he will surely hate me."

I thought of the letter and Everard's agitation, and said nothing; but it was not difficult to see that if Eva did not love her betrothed, she had learned to think all too highly of him for her own happiness.

"I love her, cousin, as I never loved any one save my mother. She is my ideal of all that is enchanting in woman, and in giving her up, I am surrendering all that makes life worth keeping. O, the struggle has been a bitter one! But I have conquered, at last; and now it only remains for me to marry, and thus fulfil my promise."

"But, Everard, you have not told me yet where you met Miss Vane. Of course it was abroad?"

"No, not exactly; we came home together, and she, as well as myself, being exempt from sea-sickness, we spent long hours together on the deck—and even in the roughest weather we had, she loved to face the storm. Her father gave her entirely to my care at such times, and I had opportunities of studying her disposition, and also judging of her talents for conversation, such as are never found in occasional visits to a lady at her own house."

"And excellent opportunities to carry on a flirtation, also, which no doubt the lady was not slow to take advantage of," I observed, mentally.

"Long before we arrived, I knew that I loved her, and had many reasons for believing that I was not indifferent to her, but resolved to see my mother before I learned anything definite. I came home, found her, my idolized mother, dying, and within an hour after my arrival, had made a promise which forever seals my wretchedness. Last night, I saw Sophia for the last time, learned enough to convince me that she is as wretched as myself, and bade her farewell. Now you have the whole history, cousin, and I shall never speak of the past again to any living being. Perhaps I should not have done so now, but that in the future you may understand my conduct; what others may think, concerns me not. At the end of three months, I shall marry Miss Emerson, who will then have obtained what she doubtless influenced my mother to get for her—wealth and a good station in society. My love she can never have—but that she will not mind; and as far as I can gratify her love for luxury and taste for society (and I presume these are her chief foibles), before the world I shall be a pattern husband."

It was in vain I tried to convince him of his error—to make him understand how far above such actions, such culpable treachery, was my favorite Eva; and I even went so far as to hint at her tender feelings for himself—but that was a subject in which, for her sake, I had to be very guarded. I might have spared myself the trouble of talking.

"I fully understand your kind intentions, cousin, but I have well thought on this matter, and the whole scheme is too plain to deceive me. As to Miss Emerson entertaining any other than very selfish feelings towards me, it is simply ridiculous, we never having met until a week ago."

Finding my efforts useless, I desisted; but my heart ached for gentle, loving Eva, in whom I felt he was winning such a treasure, and against whom he had formed so cruel a prejudice.

Of Miss Vane, I must confess I judged hardly. I knew that it was the same fault I blamed in him—unfounded prejudice; nevertheless, I could not but think that his position and property had been her aim, while their meeting on board ship (the best place in the world for a flirtation) had given her all the opportunity she wanted, to fascinate him. On board ship a beautiful woman looks still more beautiful, from the contrast with surroundings. Then there are opportunities of showing all manner of little kindnesses and attentions; to these, you may add sentimental talks by moonlight, or still more dangerous promenades, when the weather is an excuse for attentions on the part of the gentleman, for which no manner of excuse at all could be found on land, and all taken together, as I said before, for the best place to carry on a successful flirtation, commend me to a ship.

I need scarcely say that I breathed no hint to Eva of my conversation with Everard; not for worlds would I have had her know his feelings, as I trusted to time and her own goodness to convince him of his error.

He soon after left us, to attend to some property in a neighboring State, purposing then to travel for a few months. Eva and I remained alone with the servants in our old home; but we heard that previous to his departure, Everard had given orders to have the town house thoroughly repaired and furnished—all to be done and in readiness by his return. This dwelling had not been used by the family for several years, Mrs. Livingstone having preferred to reside in the country house, which had been part of her dower, to her husband's more elegant mansion in New York. Probably she disliked it from its having been the scene of her greatest sorrows, Mr. Livingstone having for many years before his death yielded to the temptations of the wine-cup, and at last become a willing slave to strong drink.

My home had been with them from the time of Everard's birth, at which period I became a widow, being then just seventeen. Mrs. Livingstone insisted on my sharing her home; and as I had no female relations except herself (we were the children of two sisters), I gladly accepted her offer, and the little Everard, named for my dead husband, became to me the dearest object on earth. I had some distant connections in the South, where, as time passed on, little families grew up, and where Aunt Mary was always a welcome guest. It was from one of these long visits that the unexpected tidings of my cousin's death summoned me to the North, where, by Everard's request, I decided to remain permanently and superintend his household.

Of Eva, it is as well here to give a more particular history. Her father had been a favorite physician of Mrs. Livingstone's, and his child had early seen trouble, though shielded as far as possible by her father's love and care. Having lost her mother and found no kind friend to take her place, the child had suffered much from the ill treatment of domestics; and when, at her father's death, she came to live with us, her lively gratitude to her benefactress was one of the great causes of Mrs. Livingstone's attachment to her. I knew that her father had left her very wealthy; but it was a subject never mentioned to her, my cousin preferring to treat her as her own child. Consequently, her property was left to accumulate; and being principally in real estate, and in the care of a capable, honest man, Eva, had it been known, would probably have been a mark for many a fortune hunter. Everard knew nothing of this; he had simply understood that she had been left to his mother's care, and naturally supposed she was poor—an idea strengthened by finding in his mother's well-kept accounts the various items of her protegee's expenses.

Thus it happened that when the wedding-day approached, and Eva's lawyer came to know if her property was to be settled on herself, Everard cut him short in his explanations by saying that he had no time to attend to it then, but that it was all to be settled on her, and also at the same time naming a liberal sum for her yearly expenses, which he desired the man of business to have properly done in legal form.

In all matters relating to their marriage, he was scrupulously particular about her consent and opinion, and at all times, when they met, ceremoniously polite; but his face now always wore its cold, hard look, and never by one word or action did he allow her to think that his share in these preparations was performed from any other motive than duty.

The day appointed came at last, something over six months after Mrs. Livingstone's death, a change Eva had wished from the first arrangement. The morning looked gloomy enough, with every symptom of a heavy storm; but as the day advanced, the clouds cleared, and after the ceremony the sun shone brightly as any bride could wish, as they drove from the house to the station where they took the cars to the city.

The wedding was quite private, neither having any relatives and but few friends. Eva looked fair and pale as a lily, in her snowy robes and veil, the faint blush on her cheek rendering her perfectly beautiful. When the ring was to be put on, Everard first removed the one she wore, put on his own plain circlet, then placed his mother's over it. I saw one tear fall then; it was the only one I saw her shed that day.

Two days after, I joined them in the city. Eva's new home was magnificent, unrivalled. All that wealth and taste could do, had been done; and her little feet trod on velvet and tapestry, her head rested on a downy couch beneath silken hangings, a score of costly mirrors reflected her slender form, and gold and silver and marble, and all that goes to adorn the dwellings of the rich, were about and around her in lavish profusion. The most expensive articles of attire were brought for her to choose from; the most obedient and well-trained domestics awaited her slightest order. If she wished to walk, her husband was always ready and willing to accompany her; if she preferred to ride, the carriage was that moment ordered to the door. And her carriage was itself an object of envy to half their acquaintances. All that money could do, was done; and yet the shadow daily deepened on her fair face, and each succeeding week saw her grow paler and more frail. Had she loved gayety and splendor, the poor child might have been happy; but it was not her nature, and she faded like a delicate flower exposed to the burning rays of a tropical sun.

It was touching to see how unweariedly she strove to win her husband's affection, and her patient love deserved a better return than it met from Everard's stubborn heart. I left them once, in hopes that when thrown entirely in each other's society, they might learn new lessons; but the experiment failed, as all others had done. Everard wrote for me at the end of a week, and though I resisted his appeal, I could not refuse, a few weeks after, to comply with Eva's pressing entreaty to return to her. Everard was unchanged; calm, polite and reserved as ever, he treated Eva precisely as he would have done a guest in his house, and his manner compelled every one else to be equally reserved.

On New Year's day, Eva completed her nineteenth year. The night before, her husband brought home a valuable set of pearls; we were invited to a large party on the second of the month, and he desired her to wear them then. This cold kindness completely overcame her, and she left the room in tears. For a few minutes he walked moodily up and down the floor, then came and stood before me.

"Can you explain Mrs. Livingstone's strange conduct, cousin? I have done everything for her that money can do, and now she is not happy. Do you suppose she wanted diamonds? If she did, she shall have them. Anything at all that she will ask for, she shall have; and all I ask in return is, that she will be happy. Of all things in the world, I hate to see a woman in tears. I promised my mother to make her happy, and I will do so if I can."

"Then you need give her no more jewels, Everard, for they are only valuable in her sight as your gifts. Bestow a few more smiles upon her, stay at home and read or talk to her, instead of going so much to your club; give her more of the love for which she is pining, and less of the splendor which sickens her; and believe me, you will soon see her look happy."

Everard heard me through, then said, in an impatient tone:

"Pshaw, cousin, that has always been your mistake! You judge Eva's disposition by your own. It is probably something she wants, and is too proud to ask for, that makes her fret. But I don't wish to be annoyed so any more."

The ball at Mrs. Trevor's was a magnificent affair, with good music, good lights, good attendants, good company and the whole thing conducted in the most unexceptionable manner. The lady herself was unrivalled in taste and splendor, her parties had always been the admiration of the circle she called her own.

I thought Everard introduced his wife with more than usual satisfaction, and that the lady appeared rather surprised at the beauty and grace of the fair Eva Livingstone. Certainly no woman in the room could compare with her, the dress of pale blue satin suiting admirably her delicate complexion and light brown hair, while pearls were the only ornaments which ever became her. I wore dark lavender and black lace, the gayest dress I had put on for five and twenty years; but it was Everard's wish, and I loved to gratify him.

After promenading for a short time, Everard left us together in one of the deep, heavily curtained windows, and as the rooms filled, the scene became very interesting. Here, undisturbed and unseen we could watch the rest, and enjoyed it until a party came and seated themselves directly before us, and where we could not avoid hearing all they said. They had scarcely got themselves seated, and their flounces arranged, when a buzz at the other end of the room announced a new arrival, and escorted by several gentlemen, and followed by a large party of ladies, we saw a beautiful girl advancing towards us. From the heavy braids of her dark hair to the belt which clasped her slender waist, she was glittering with jewels; they sparkled from her neck, her arms, her hands (very beautiful hands and arms they were, and well displayed), and they circled her head in a glittering diadem. She wore a rich purple satin, and with the heavy folds sweeping the ground, might well have been mistaken for some royal queen.

"Who is it?" one of the ladies before us asked her neighbor.

"Why, don't you see? It is Sophia Vane."

I started involuntarily, and Eva looked at me, but I could not remove my eyes from the proud beauty on whom all eyes were now turned.

"I hear she is going to be married," said the first speaker.

"Yes, to old Mr. Lincoln, very much to his nephew Bob Lincoln's annoyance; for the old man they say could buy up half Wall Street, and poor Bob would certainly have been his heir. It is also quite a surprise to Miss Vane's friends, for you know since that affair of Livingstone's, she has flirted dreadfully, and they really thought she never would marry."

"Well, to tell you the truth I never did understand rightly about that affair."

"You didn't? Well you see they came all the way home from Florence together, and of course Sophia would not lose such an opportunity, so at last Livingstone was over head and ears in love, and as soon as he landed went off to see his mother, and get her consent, it appears. He only got there the day she died, and she made him promise to marry a girl she had picked up somewhere, a doctor's daughter, or something like that I believe. A homely little rustic I have heard them say she was, and that's the reason she does not go out more; I have never met her yet. It is too bad for Livingstone, such a splendid fellow as he is, to be tied to such a wife; not but what I think he had a lucky escape from Sophia, for she is a dreadful flirt, but then he liked her, and you know love is blind."

Our gossiping neighbors went away, and I hardly dared to look at Eva. She was very pale, and apparently lost in thought, but at last she said, quickly:

"Let us go and walk with the rest; I am tired of sitting here."

As we passed out we met Mrs. Trevor, leaning on the arm of a most distinguished looking man. She introduced him as her brother, Mr. N——. He bowed low to Eva, and after conversing for a few minutes asked her to dance. To my surprise she instantly consented, and they went away. I soon after followed, and by a strange coincidence saw that they were standing opposite to Everard, and his partner was Miss Vane. Eva danced superbly, and never better than on this occasion, while I could see that she was holding an animated conversation with her partner.

Miss Vane glanced critically at the stranger, and Everard looked restless and unhappy. When the dance was finished, Mr. N—— and his partner were joined by Mr. Trevor and a few other of the elder gentlemen, all talented, highly educated and well-known men. The peculiar education Eva had received from her father, and the solid studies she had all her life pursued, enabled her now to join in the conversation of her new companions with far more spirit than she had just before mingled in the dance. They were charmed; here was a learned lady without the least tinge of blueism, with new and brilliant ideas on most subjects, and an intimate acquaintance with authors the very names of which are unknown to the fashionable ladies of the present day. Perhaps not the least of Eva's charms was her simplicity; she did not like the society of young men, they were all dull in comparison to Everard, but old men brought back the memory of her father, and with them she was always a favorite. When Everard came to lead his wife away, the oldest man of the group came forward, and shaking him heartily by the hand, congratulated him on the matrimonial prize he had drawn, adding:

"I shall take the privilege of an old friend, and come frequently to see you, if only for the selfish gratification of a conversation with your wife."

Such words from such a man were no mere praise, for Professor ——'s indifference to the ladies was as well known as his fame was wide spread. Eva and I spoke of the conversation we had overheard but once, when she asked me if I had known of Everard's love for Miss Vane before. She sighed heavily when I answered in the affirmative, and the subject was dropped.

The winter passed quickly, for we lived a gay life, and as Eva now made a point of always accepting invitations, her husband could no longer accuse her of staying at home to annoy him. She felt that Miss Vane was artfully weaving spells around Everard, even now while he vainly struggled to free himself from the fascinating influence, and it was her place to be at his side. The gay season was over at last, but our return to the country was delayed by Everard being taken suddenly ill. Eva nursed him through his short but painful sickness, and when he recovered, Miss Vane was married, and had gone on a wedding tour.

We went back to the Grove, Eva rejoicing to be once more among the birds and flowers, Everard more gloomy and reserved than ever. Poor Everard, I pitied him now; he had scorned Eva's love in the day when it might have been his, and now when he had learned her worth, learned how highly others esteemed her, he also discovered that his love was not necessary to her happiness. Believing that it was too late now to repair his error, and too proud to make any change in his behaviour, or let her know his feelings, he suffered in silence torments of remorse.

It was a sad misunderstanding, for had she dreamed of the change in his feelings all would have been well, but believing that he loved Miss Vane, and that her own fate was inevitable, she strove still to do her duty, to cheerfully accept the bounteous gifts Heaven had lavished on her, to render her husband's home as pleasant to him as possible, and patiently submit to what she could not avert.

Early in the summer business called Everard away from home, and he purposed taking a voyage to Cuba ere he returned, to settle the affairs of a deceased friend. I had hoped that this separation might break down the barriers to happiness these two proud young people had raised for themselves, but again I was mistaken. They parted as usual, with a simple hand clasp, and when I asked Eva as she sobbed and wept on her couch why she had so dissembled her grief before her husband, she said she had done so dreading his cold reproof, wishing at least to part in peace. All things had been done to ensure our comfort during his absence, the house had been thoroughly repaired, Eva's apartments beautifully furnished, the gardens carefully attended, and a greenhouse built and well stocked with choice exotics.

The summer was very warm, and I saw that Eva suffered from the excessive heat; having no longer a motive for appearing cheerful she sunk into a dangerous state of sadness, and all my efforts to rouse her were vain. Our daily walks were gradually shortened into a stroll in the gardens, then to a visit to the green-house, and at last she could go no further than to the open window of her boudoir. Here under the shadow of the pink silk curtains, reclining on her favorite lounge, she spent her days, hourly growing more feeble, and as I feared rapidly falling into a consumption. In his three months' absence, Everard had sent us but three letters, one only of the number being to Eva. It was in the usual reserved style in which he always addressed her, commencing simply "Mrs. Livingstone," but she shed many tears over those few lines, and I noticed failed more rapidly afterwards.

We received a letter from the city one day, one of those gossiping, scandal-bearing epistles which some women love so well to indite. It contained the intelligence that Mrs. Lincoln had eloped with a dashing foreigner, having first robbed her husband of an immense sum of money. The poor old man through grief and vexation had died next day. I must confess to feeling some anxiety to know what Everard would think of his paragon now. Eva said little, but she truly pitied the misguided young woman.

As the autumn approached, I began to grow seriously alarmed at the state of Eva's health; her appetite was gone, her face and hands, always fair, 'became transparently white, and her eyes looked larger than ever, and more beautifully blue and bright. She could no longer move without assistance, and as I daily placed her on her sofa, I prayed that Everard might return ere it was too late.

It was time now that he should come, and I had resolved to write at all hazards, and tell him of the change in his wife's health, when I received an unexpected letter from him. He had returned to Mobile and was finishing up the business which had occupied him all summer, and he gave many minute details, but that was the least interesting part of his letter. He had met Mrs. Lincoln and her guilty companion, had been the first to inform them of Mr. Lincoln's death, and had been most thoroughly shocked and disgusted by Sophia's unfeeling ridicule of the old man who had only loved and trusted her too well, as also by the manner in which she rejected all his entreaties that she and her companion should immediately be married.

"Most heartily did I thank God for preserving me from the fate to which I should doubtless have rushed on; most heartily did I thank him for the gift of my innocent, pure-minded wife, my beautiful Eva. And now, if by his mercy I am spared to see home once more, I shall devote the remainder of my life to teaching Eva to love me—she must, she shall love me—I have no more pride, no thought, no hope save the one constant longing to hold her to my heart, and hear the loved words from her own lips. I have spent five wretched months striving to conquer what I thought a pitiful weakness, but as well might I try to stem the river's current, as quell the all powerful sensations which have now assumed their rightful possession in my soul. I cannot write to Eva. Only at her feet can I ask pardon for my cruel injustice. Write to me immediately; I shall be obliged to remain here long enough to get your answer."

I dared not refuse to give Eva her husband's letter, yet dreaded its effect, but my worst fears were short of anticipating the consequences. After reading it she sat silent for a time, then a frightful convulsion passed over her, and she fell forward on the sofa; when I raised her the red blood was flowing from her lips, and fell warm on my hands. What I wrote to Everard I do not know, it must have been something dreadful.

Nine o'clock, and a cold stormy autumn night, the wind roaring round the house, and the rain dashing against the windows in sudden gusts. Without all was noise and storm, and darkness; within, peace and warmth and stillest silence. I sat in Eva's chamber and watched; the firelight making fantastic shadows in the room, sometimes flickering over the pale face, lying in such deathlike repose on the snowy pillows, and sometimes on the sleeping infant in my arms, Eva's new-born babe. It was an hour of deep anxiety, for the mother's life seemed ebbing fast.

"She might revive, but the chances were against her." And the physician looked too grave for me to doubt his real opinion, even had my own convictions not been the same.

"O, that her husband would come, that he might see her alive once more!" I had said again and again, and at last, as if in answer to my prayer, came the sound of his horse's feet above even the roar of the storm. I laid the sleeping infant in its little bed, and went forth to meet him.

"Mary, is she still alive?"

I pressed his hand in silence, it was no time to tell him my fears then. In a few minutes he was beside her, gazing with an aching heart on the ravages a few short months had made. She still slept, a deathlike slumber, all unconscious of whose tears were falling on her pillow. I drew aside the lace curtains of the infant's cradle, and whispered Everard to come. He started with surprise at sight of the tiny occupant.

"Mary, what is this?"

"Eva's child and yours," I answered, and placed his little daughter in his arms.

Poor Everard, he might well say his pride was gone; never was man more thoroughly repentant for the past. Through the long hours of the night we watched beside the sleeper, occasionally drawing near to make sure that she really breathed.

At sunrise, while he still sat near her, she suddenly opened her eyes and called his name. I went softly out of the room, and when I returned an hour after, Eva had again fallen asleep, her hand fast clasped in her husband's, the babe held lovingly to her bosom. Everard's face was radiant with joy.

"She says she will not leave me," he whispered. "That my love has given her new strength."

And his words proved prophetic. Day by day she improved under our careful nursing, until after weary weeks she was permitted once more to leave her chamber for the favorite little sitting-room. It was a joyful day when borne in Everard's strong arms she changed the dreary sameness of the sick room for her comfortable sofa in the bay window.

And a pretty picture they made, sitting there under the rose colored drapery. I wish my talent for description was greater, that I might make you see them as I do, even to this day. Eva in her rich, fur-lined dressing robe, whose crimson hue imparted a faint flush to her delicate cheek; her slippered feet resting on a soft ottoman; in her hand, still too weak for much service to its owner, is held a tiny bouquet, Everard's morning gift from the green-house. He sits beside her, and with many merry jokes to hide a deeper feeling, binds golden threads around the two wedding rings, now all too large for Eva's poor, thin finger. The still little babe is in its cradle, between the lace curtain of which Everard frequently looks down to assure himself it has not vanished away, this precious miniature copy of his young wife. It was beautiful to see him in his new character of father, displaying a world of tenderness and feeling, even I who had known him all his life had never believed he possessed. I think that that day's pure joy more than repaid them for the sufferings of the past year. Eva tried to recollect how old the child was, and commenced counting, then suddenly stopped:

"Why, Everard, this is our wedding-day."

In the trouble and anxiety, and then the joy of hope, we had all forgotten it. She was right in another sense, it was truly their wedding-day—the day on which they were united never more to part until that awful separation which should at last bring them together for eternity. When a novel writer has happily united his hero and heroine, he usually leaves them with the vague intimation to his readers that thenceforward their days know no more of sorrow or suffering; a very mistaken idea to give the young folks, and one in which I believe exists the greatest danger of romance reading.

I cannot from my own personal experience disprove this fallacy, my short married life of three months having been a season of unclouded happiness; but in the awful awakening from this dream, I probably endured as much agony as those live through who for long years together fight life's battles. In the course of an extended observation I have found that, however great the trials of love may be, there is still in most cases a spice of romance to sweeten them, while the troubles of married life are so common, and in most cases commonplace also, that romancers do well to eschew them altogether. Knowing this, I shall hasten over the remaining incidents of this little history, lest my readers also weary.

After Eva's recovery, neither she nor her husband ever found any wish to return to their city home, preferring to live in the delightful tranquillity of the Grove. The child grew and thrived well, though never very strong, and I actually trembled when I saw how Everard's very existence was twined round the life of this delicate flower. With less of her mother's cheerful life, she yet strongly resembled her; the same blue eyes and transparent complexion, the slender, graceful form and low-toned voice; but her hair was like her father's, jetty black, and like him her manner had a most unchildish reserve.

To no one did she ever fully open her little heart but her father, and between them there was a strong bond of sympathy. He called her Mary, his mother's name and mine, and he loved her as we should never love the beautiful but perishing things of earth. When little Mary had well nigh completed her third year, two more children were given to us, not as she had been in the storm and shadow, but under the full sunshine of love and unclouded happiness. Fine, rosy, laughing little ones they were, those beautiful twins, the boy with dark hair and eyes, the image of his father as I remembered him in youth; the girl with sunny curls and her mother's own merry smile; no one could blame us that we loved them as we did.

As Mary grew older her father saw with terror how ill her strength kept pace with her increasing height. Uncommonly tall for her years she was slender to attenuation, and quite unable to take sufficient exercise. A horse was purchased for her use; then the riding habit and side saddle were given up for a low, easy carriage, and that at last yielded to a cushioned chair wheeled slowly about the grounds. But why should I linger on the sad details? Why dwell upon the parents' agony as day by day they saw the hectic flush rise to the pallid cheek, heard the faint cough, and touched the burning hands? It is a story thousands in our land who have similarly watched can better feel than I describe. Suffice it that she died, our little one who had never seemed of earth like other children. This was the first great sorrow, and it came upon Everard with a crushing force, finding him sadly unprepared, for with a not unusual self-deception he had hoped to the last.

Our second trial was far away, but the years brought that also, and this time the blow fell heaviest on the mother. When Claude, her noble boy, was yet a child, his fancy ever led him to the sea; and the idea increased with his growth until it became the one fixed purpose of his life. Long the mother's tears prevailed, but at last it was decided that he should be gratified, and with an agony scarce less than she would have laid him in the grave did Eva let him go.

Our house was lonely now, for little Eva could no longer sing when her twin brother and playmate was on the wide ocean, and I too loved the boy the best of Everard's children. He sailed a long voyage, and at different periods for three years we received his letters, precious letters, brimful of love and longing to see once more the dear ones at home. In the meantime a suitor came for little Eva, the youngest and the pet, but whose advances were at first sadly checked by the mother's refusal.

"Would you take my last child from me?"

she asked of Everard, who had undertaken to plead the young man's cause.

"But, Eva, would you prevent our child from enjoying such happiness as ours has been through all these long years?"

"But the trials, Everard, think of what we have endured; I cannot let her go through the same or perhaps worse."

"The trials will come, sooner or later; let the child fulfil her destiny."

And so it came that in a few weeks after, our fair, sunny-haired Eva wreathed orange blossoms in her golden curls and stood beside her handsome lover to take the vows which would bid them stand side by side through life. We had a gay young party, for the bride was well-beloved, and only one thought clouded her fair brow, and dimmed the mother's eyes with tears; only one form was wanting in the smiling group.

But silence now, our white-haired pastor who gave the bride her name is opening his book; when, hark! some one comes hastily, the door is swung wide, and a tall, manly form comes forward. It is a strange intrusion at such a time, but Everard steps forth to bid him welcome. He smiles strangely at the formal greeting, and passing in, opens wide his arms, and speaks the one word, "Mother." The circle is complete.

ROMANCE AND REALITY.

About thirty years ago when Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer was a bridegroom and the present Lady Bulwer his bride, that exquisite poetess "L. E. L.," wrote and published an account of their characters and personal appearance. They were both quite young, and each of them was in delicate health. The bridegroom was described as pale and fascinating, and the bride was painted as a fragile and fairy-like creature of surpassing loveliness. The tender tints of her cheek were said to be "like rose-leaves crushed on ivory." The description was read everywhere, and the public admiration and the public sympathy were deeply excited for the charming young pair, who, it was thought, must soon pass away from a world too coarse and rude for such gentle and lovely natures as theirs.

Ah, little dreamed the reader then, that, after a very few years, the gentle bridegroom would strike the tender bride, that she would seek redress by publishing a series of coarse, fierce, and vituperative novels and pamphlets against him, and that, after a few more years, she, grown to be a sturdy, red-faced, and muscular woman, would pursue him in his canvass for Parliament, take her stand upon the hustings in reply to his public speeches, call upon him to confront her, shout "coward" at him in his precipitate flight from her presence, and announce her determination to persecute him till he should cry for mercy and humbly make her amends for all his villainies.—Louisville Journal.

JAMIE.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

He possesseth no lands or houses,
 Ruleth no kingdom o'er—
 Holds neither stocks nor vassals,
 And people say he is poor!
 His hands are hardened by labor,
 By tolling he earns his bread—
 He has but a meagre roof above him
 To shelter his kingly head;
 And yet I had rather reign in his bosom
 Than be heir of Lord Ethelred!

Ethelred has a million of money,
 Is the wealthiest man in the shire—
 Owneth the wide stretch of country
 From Grandfrd hills to the Mere!
 Jamie's a brave-hearted fellow,
 Honest, handsome, and kind—
 Ethelred pleases the princesses,
 Jamie is more to my mind:
 And when I think over his heart-wealth
 I'd be heiress to all that I find!

Lady Gertrude may roll in her chariot,
 Her frouces in billows of silk—
 Stream out on the air of morning,
 While I go to the pasture to milk!
 The lords of the court may adore her,
 And Ethelred pick up her fan,
 And with curtains of gauze foil the sunlight
 From coming his lily to tan!
 But I am a free-hearted woman—
 If I marry, I marry a man!

Better Jamie's respect for me
 Than mountains of silver and gold—
 They could not warm my soul's hearthstones,
 Or serve for his arms' loving fold!
 Gold could not buy me a divan
 Half so dreamily fair,
 As the shelter of one human bosom.
 And one human hand on my hair!
 Little care I for the earth-wealth,
 If I to dear Jamie am heir!

CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS.

No one who has once been a drunkard is ever safe from falling, this side the grave; it is a terrible truth, but it is a reality. We knew a Mrs. H—, in our childhood, who finding her husband dead drunk one day, sewed him up in a sheet, and gave him a tremendous cowhiding. He never got drunk again; in this case it was the fear of the hide, and not of the fall. But one of the speediest rousers from a state of stupid, beastly intoxication we have ever read of, is, to turn the brute on his right side, hold up his left arm, and pour a pitcher of cold water down his sleeve slowly. He will walk perfectly sober in five minutes. But this only cures until next time. We rather think that the raw hide is a more vivid remembrancer; and our old friend, cold water, must yield the palm this time.—Hall's Journal of Health.

We know many things indifferently—superficially—but few, very few, thoroughly.—Bovee.

AN OUTRAGED SHOWMAN.

Artemus Ward has written a letter to the Cleveland Plaindealer. In it he says:

"Hear in the Buzzum of my famerly i am enjoyin myself, at peas with awl mankind and the wimmin folks likewise. I go down to the village ockashunly and take a little old Rye fur the stum-mucks sake, but i avoyd spiritus luckers as a giner-al thing. No man evir seen me, intossikated but onct and that air happind in Pittsburg. A parsel of ornery cusses in that mizzerable sity bustid inter the hawl durin the nite and aboosed my wax works shamful. I didnt observe the outrajus transachuns untill the next evenin when the peple begun for to kongregate. Suddlin they kommensed fur two larf and holler in a boyterious stile. Sez i good peple whats up? Sez thay them grate wax works ient they old man? I immejitly looked up ter where the wax works was and my blad bites as i think of the site which then met my Gase. I hope two be dobrabbertid if them afoursed rascals hadn't gone and put a old kaved in hat onter George Washington's hed and shuvd a short black klay pipe inter his mouth. His noze they had paintid red and his trowsis legs they had shuvd inside his butes.

"My wax figger of Napoleong Boneypart was likewise mawltreatid. his sword was danglin tween his legs, his cocked hat was drawn klean down over his ize and he was played in a stoopin posishun lookin zactly as tho he was as drunk as a biled owl. Ginral Tayler was standin on his hed and Wingfield Skott's koat tales were pind over his hed and his trowsis ware kompletely torn orf frum hisself. My wax works representin the Lords Last Supper was likewise aboosed. Three of the Postles ware under the table and two of um had on old tarpawlin hats and ragged-pee jackits and ware smokin pipes. Judus Iskariot had on a cocked hat and was apparently drinkin, as a Bottle of whisky sot befor him. This ere speckteral wus too much fur me. i klosed the show and then drowndid my sorrers in the flowin Bole.

"Probly ile rite you agin befor i take my departure on the Summer kampaign.

"Very respectfully Yures,
 "ARTEMUS WARD, T. K."

THE STRENGTH OF WOMAN.

Is it not wonderful that, down to the present time, women have really never discovered their own tremendous strength? They have only to be of one accord, and in some hundred years at most, the human race would fade clean from the earth, fade like an old multiplication sum from a school-boy's slate. And this truth is either so profound, that, like a well sunk to the antipodos, woman is afraid to look into it—her little head would turn so giddy at the very brink—or, by some accident, it is one of the wells of truth (and she has many) that Rebecca has not yet discovered.—Jerrald.

EXPERIENCE.

Ah! who can say, however fair his view,
 Through what sad scenes his path may lie?
 Let careless youth its seeming love pursue,
 Soon will they learn to scan with thoughtful eye
 The illusive past and dark futurity.—KINGS WATTS.

A SERENADE.

BY LIZZIE MORSE.

Wake, love, wake! the silver dews are falling,
The winds and the waves with flute tones are calling,
Where the reeds and the flowers are nodding in their dreams;

The wave's low dash is heard,
And the trilling night bird
Is humming a song where the starlight gleams.

Wake, love, wake! the summer moon is stealing
Along o'er the vale, and our vine bower revealing,
And the shy birds are keeping our trysting hour alone;
Whispers float upon the stream,
In the grass the fire-flies gleam,
And the winds seem to breathe seek, seek thine own.

O, haste, love, haste, and let us be a roaming
With thy soft white feet where the blue stream is foaming,
And flowers, love, to bend 'neath thy light, fairy tread;
Thy voice my music sweet,
And thy dark eye guide my feet
Where the wild roses blush at thy warm lip so red.

Dost thou hear my song, love? O, let us be a going;
Haste while the clouds o'er the tell-tale moon are blowing,
Steal from thy casement, like a star from the sky;
My guitar to thee I'll wake,
Thy throne shall be the glossy brake;
Then haste down, my love, and away let us fly!

IRISH DROLLERY.

An amusing story of Daines Barrington, Recorder of Bristol, is related by one of the British press. Having to appear for the plaintiff in the case of a winter assize at Clonmel, he "let into" the defendant in no measured terms. The individual inveighed against not being present, only heard of the invectives. After Barrington, however, had got back to Dublin, the Tipperary man lost no time in paying his compliments to the counsel. He rode all day and night, and covered with sleet, arrived before Barrington's residence, in Harcourt Street, Dublin. Throwing the bridle of his smoking horse over the railing of the area, he announced his arrival by a thundering knock at the door, which nearly shook the street. Barrington's valet answered the summons, and opening the street door, beheld the apparition of a rough-coated Tipperary fire-eater, with a large stick under his arm, and the sleet sticking to his bushy whiskers.

"Is your master up?" demanded the visitor, in a voice that gave some intimation of the object of his journey.

"No," answered the man.

"Then give him my compliments, and say Mr. Foley (he'll know the name) will be glad to see him."

The valet went up stairs and told his master, who was in bed, the purport of his visit.

"Then don't let Mr. Foley in for your life," said Barrington, "for it is not a hare nor a brace of ducks he has come to present me with."

The man was leaving the bed-room, when a rough, wet coat pushed by him, while a thick voice said:

"By your leave—" And at the same moment Mr. Foley entered the bed-room.

"You know my business, sir," said he to Barrington; "I have made a journey to teach you manners, and it's not my purpose to return until I have broken every bone in your body." And the same time he cut a figure of eight with his shillelah before the cheval glass.

"You do not mean to say you would murder me in bed," exclaimed Daines, who had as much honor as cool courage.

"No," replied the other, "but get up as soon as you can."

"Yes," replied Daines, "that you might fell me the moment I put my body out of the blankets."

"No," replied the other, "I pledge you my word not to touch you till you are out of bed."

"You won't? Upon your honor?"

"Upon my honor."

"That is enough," said Daines, turning over and making himself comfortable, and seeming as though he meant to fall asleep, "I have the honor of an Irish gentleman, and may rest as safe as though I were under the castle guard."

The Tipperary salamander looked marvellously astonished at the pretended sleeper, but soon Daines began to snore.

"Halloa!" says Mr. Foley, "aren't you going to get up?"

"No," said Daines, "I have the word of an Irish gentleman that he will not strike me in bed, and I am sure I am not going to get up to have my bones broken. I will never get up again. In the meantime, Mr. Foley, if you should want your breakfast, ring the bell; the best in the house is at your service. The morning paper will be here presently, but be sure and air it before reading, for there is nothing from which a man so quickly catches cold as reading a damp journal." And Daines affected to go to sleep.

The Tipperary had fun in him as well as ferocity; he could not resist the cunning of the counsel:

"Get up, Mr. Barrington, for in bed or out of bed, I have not the pluck to hurt so droll a heart."

The result was that less than an hour afterwards, Daines and his intended murderer were sitting down to a warm breakfast, the latter only intent upon assailing a dish of smoking chops.

NEW VIEW OF VACATIONS.

The London News says it is held that bankers, clerks, cashiers and others in situations of trust, are not only entitled to occasional relaxation, but ought to be compelled to absent themselves for a time now and then, from their places of business, because thus much fraud may be prevented. While a fraudulent person is on the spot and vigilant, he can keep his irregularities safe, but if you send him away to Southend or Herne Bay, you break the threads of his plot, and he is pretty sure to be found out. So now a clerk who wants a holiday seems to have a new and proud claim to one. "I should like to have a little sea air," will henceforth mean, "examine my books, compare my balances—I am totus teres atque rotundus." And a man never taking a holiday—always a bad sign—will now be almost enough to warrant a call for A 198.

A PLAINT.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

My overburdened breast
Sickens with care, grows weary, weak and faint,
Nor ceases in its melancholy plaint,
"Give, give me rest!"

The fleeting joys of earth
Are apples on the Dead Sea shore of Time;
And life—what is it but a transient mime,
Devoid of mirth?

In the departed years
I see a youthful form with hope elate;
A youthful heart whose trust is placed in Fate,
Blindest of seers!

Still further on is seen
The gladiator, man, amid the fray,
Ceaselessly coping with a storm to-day,
With anxious mien.

And now a sad, unblest,
And wearied pilgrim, by the wayside—faint,
Drooping, despairing, breathes a bitter plaint,
A cry for rest!

Nor wealth, nor glittering fame,
Naught that the world can give doth he require;
"Rest!" is his only hope, his soul's desire,
His eager claim.

But hark! Methinks I hear
From the low grave an echo and reply:
"Who calls for rest? Wouldst thou in sorrow die?
Hast thou no fear

"Of laying rashly down
The burden of thy fair mortality?
Wouldst thou, regardless of the cross, be free
To wear the crown?

"Nay—fire anew thy breast,
Call back thy manhood, cheek each sinful moan;
And when thy race is won, and then alone,
Receive thy rest."

THE BARTERED BIRTHRIGHT.

A ROMANCE OF OLD ENGLAND.

BY MRS. C. F. GERRY.

"God help me! I am ruined—ruined!" And Ralph Montrose staggered back, as if a thrice-barbed arrow had struck to his heart.

"Yes, ruined!" responded a deep, rich, but very contemptuous voice. "One of the proud race of Montrose has turned out a thief! O,
Ralph, I never thought we should come to this.
I could not believe it now, were it not for proof which I cannot gainsay. Why, I wonder our dead father don't rise from the grave to haunt you, his best beloved son and heir, for the foul stigma you have thrown upon his name."

The young man had spoken with a rapid utterance, his swart cheek reddening, his dark eye flashing fire; but when the last sentence died away from his haughty lips, a hush like the solemn silence which broods over a churchyard at night, pervaded the grand, old chamber.

That scene Salvator Rosa might have painted, throwing every object into bold relief; but I have no power fitly to portray. Dense shadows enveloped the greater part of the room, but the strong, red glare of a lantern shone full on a quaint rosewood escritoire, the lid of which was held back by an insolent Bow-Street officer, revealing a single heavy, golden bracelet, starred with three brilliants almost as large and pure as the far-famed Kohinoor diamond. At a little distance, leaning against one of the massive pillars, which gave such an air of stateliness to the chamber, stood Ralph Montrose, the ill-fated man, in whose private escritoire the splendid bauble had been found; his head bowed, his marble face half averted, his stalwart frame trembling like a wind-shaken leaf, while his slight, dark-browed step-brother paced to and fro along the gorgeous Turkey carpet, in wild agitation.

"Well, I mustn't wait here," at length began the officer in a gruff tone; "the Countess of Winterton is worried to death about the loss of her bracelet, 'cause you see only royal crowns can boast of such jewels. The fellow who stole 'em will have to pay high for his crime. Come along, young jail bird!" And he fastened an iron grasp on Ralph Montrose.

At the touch of that rude official, a shudder convulsed the prisoner; the blood of his noble race flushed cheek and neck, and brow, and with a desperate effort he shook off the policeman's grasp. The insulted dignitary growled a horrid oath, adding:

"No resistance, young man; you're my prisoner, and there's no getting away. One whistle will bring in a whole posse of officers ten times more savage than I am. Come along, peaceably."

"As God hears me, I am innocent!" cried the young man. "If I have been dumb since you found the bracelet in my possession, it was not because I felt overwhelmed with conscious guilt, but because the spell of despair was strong upon me. I have enemies—this is some plot to ruin me."

"Plot!" sneered the officer; "I've heard villains talk afore."

"Plot!" echoed Richard Montrose. "For the honor of our house, I wish I could believe it; but I cannot—cannot, the evidence against you is so strong. On returning from a dinner here at your house, the Countess of Winterton missed her bracelet, an ornament she has always prized very highly, because those three jewels with which it is set are so rare—"

"Well, well," interrupted the elder brother, impatiently, "valuable as it is, why should I want to steal it? I have wealth sufficient to gratify my most extravagant wishes."

"I know all this, Ralph," rejoined Richard, in a significant tone. "I know, too, that where there is a propensity to evil, neither rank nor riches can prevent it from working itself out. How can I credit your protestations of innocence, when I review the whole matter? The countess at once came to you to ascertain if you knew anything about her loss. You declared point-blank that you had no knowledge of it. Then she sent a party of London officers, with the request that they might be allowed to search the house, as perhaps some of the servants had stolen it. With evident reluctance you consented, and the bracelet was found in your private escritoire. O, Ralph! Ralph!"

The prisoner groaned aloud. "I confess that circumstances are against me," he said, speaking slowly, and with extreme difficulty, "nevertheless, I am as innocent of this crime as the dead father to whom you have alluded. I repeat it—I am innocent! If I were dying, I would declare it with my last breath."

Richard Montrose did not speak, but his incredulous look, his scornful silence, were more eloquent than words.

"You've got a glib tongue," retorted the officer, "but none of your high-flown speeches can move me. I'm here to see justice done. Come!" And again his heavy hand fell on the young man's shoulder.

How Ralph Montrose writhed, as the stern official began to move towards the door, dragging him after him.

"O, Dick," he shouted, "this will kill me! Is there no way of escape? You and I are not own brothers, but we had the same father; for his sake I conjure you to help me in my great extremity. Save me! O, save me—save me!"

Still Richard was silent.

"This officer will not heed me," continued the elder brother, "but you, you may have some influence with him. You are a barrister, argue my cause with all your eloquence, Dick! Get him to hush up the affair, for I can't have it dragged into the light, or prove my innocence!"

Richard Montrose deliberated a few moments, and then said:

"Well, Ralph, I will do what I can for you; but do not hope too much from my interposition, I fear the officer is inexorable."

The man smiled sarcastically, and when Richard asked a private interview with him in an adjoining room, assented with the dogged air of one who is resolved that he will not be persuaded. Then, taking care to secure his prisoner, he followed Richard. As the two passed from Ralph's presence, he flung up his arms in a wild, despairing gesture, and moaned out the single word, "Catharine!" Then, sinking down on a luxurious couch, he buried his face in the pillows, and lay absorbed in a painful reverie. At length the door unclosed, and Richard came softly in.

"O, Dick, can you save me from that loathsome life at Newgate?" cried Ralph, leaping forward.

"Yes, yes, I think so; the officer who just went hence, I have recognized as a man who once put himself under great obligations to me; I believe I can bribe him to silence."

Ralph's clear, blue eyes kindled. "Then do, do bring him to terms, brother Dick," he said, with impassioned earnestness, "and I—I will bless you to my latest day."

"Blessings alone will not suffice me," replied the younger brother, a strange, sardonic smile flickering over his dark face, "I must have a more tangible reward."

"Reward! Name it, Dick, name it, and it shall be yours!"

"You are the eldest born, the heir to the family estates. Will you barter your birthright for the service you need?"

The young man gave a sudden start. He had not expected so exorbitant a demand, and it was no light thing to relinquish what he had held with such pride. He moved to the window, and flinging back the cloud of Syrian drapery which curtained it, looked out. There lay the broad demesne, which owned him as its master, with its fair reaches of underland, its green slopes, its blue lakes, its shadowy old woods, with its vast fields of grain heaving in the night-wind, like a golden sea, its purpling grape-clusters, its fruit-laden boughs. Never had he so fully realized what a treasure it was as at that moment, and a spasm of pain contracted his features, as he muttered to himself:

"I had thought to live and die here in this place, with Catharine to share my prosperity, my happiness; but now that this disgrace has fallen on me, I must flee. It is better that Dick should have it, than that I should wear out my life within the walls of Newgate!" And with a sad resolve pictured on every lineament, he turned toward his brother. "I will comply with the conditions," he said, mournfully, "my birthright is yours."

"One thing more, Ralph. Catharine Tracy was betrothed to you in your childhood, with the understanding that you were to be the heir of our father's wealth and position. You have given up the heirship—will you abandon all claims to Kate?"

"No, no, I cannot—she loves me—she will believe in my innocence—she will cling to me like a true woman! No, Dick, I can't barter her with the family estates."

"Then take the hard lot of a felon! I shall not shield you from exposure, unless you relinquish Catharine also!"

For a time the young man stood aghast. He thought of Catharine, so pure, so fair, so proud, too, and his heart grew heavy.

"I will not seek to bow her stately head in shame," he said, at length, in a half-audible tone. "Richard, the Rubicon of my destiny is crossed—I give up even Catharine!"

"Very well," was the cool reply, and Dick Montrose bent low over the bracelet he had been swinging in his hand, to hide the gleam of triumph that shot into his basilisk eyes. "There is yet another condition," he murmured.

"What is it?"

"I wish you to leave the country without a parting interview with Kate Tracy."

Again Ralph hesitated, but finally said, in a low, sad tone:

"At first I thought I couldn't consent to this, but on reflection, it seems the best thing I can do. A meeting—a farewell under such circumstances—O, Dick, they would only deepen my misery! And now, how can we manage about the theft?"

"Why, I will bribe the officer to declare that no clue to the missing gewgaw has been found here. Then I will write an anonymous letter to the countess, and enclose it in a package with the bracelet. In the letter I will state that the pangs of a guilty conscience have driven the unknown thief to return the stolen property."

The young man's brow knit, his proud lips curled.

"Villain as you think me," he muttered, "this is the first fraud in which I ever participated. It galls me to act a lie, but I shall thus escape the stigma of a felon, the public trial, the disgraceful imprisonment. I shall leave England to-night—"

"But before you go," interposed the younger brother, "you will give me a deed of transfer."

"Yes; who shall draw up the paper?"

"The village notary; I will send for him."

With these words Richard Montrose grasped a bell-cord and rang violently. The servant who answered the summons was despatched to the notary, and in a few moments that worthy was seated at his task in the library of Montrose Hall. It was like signing his own death-warrant for Ralph to give his signature, but he went through with the formula, and then hastened to take a farewell survey of the interior of the old mansion.

"Well, Dick," he said hoarsely, as they stood together on the threshold, "we shall never meet again. Take good care of the homestead, and the tenantry, and—and—Catharine—my Catharine—if you succeed in winning her; deal very gently with her woman's heart. Good-by, Dick—a long, long good-by."

Silently the two brothers clasped hands; then Ralph stole down the massive sandstone steps, and across the great park, shadowy with giant trees, and haunted by graceful deer, and as he moved on into the cold, pitiless world, ever and anon casting back a wild, wistful gaze, such as Adam might have turned toward Eden, when the voice of God had said "Begone!" and the banishing angels waved their swords of flame from its fair walls.

While Ralph Montrose was bartering his birthright, and even his betrothed bride, a woman stood watching and waiting for him at a trysting place, where they had often met. That woman was Catharine Tracy. She was a superb creature, with a tall and exquisitely proportioned form, a faultless cast of features, a rich, creamy complexion, eyes like the blue of the summer sky, and masses of soft, wavy hair, "brown in the shadow and gold in the sun." There was unmistakable pride in the curl of her red lips and the arch of her white and stately neck, and yet, with her patrician grace of manner blended the warm blush, the flitting smile, and all the sweet unrest, which betokens joyous expectancy. At length, as the chime of the monastery bells broke upon her ear, she started.

"Why, where can he be?" she murmured. "He said that he should be here ere the old bell had told the hour of nine, and now it is ten, and still he comes not. I never waited thus before; he has always waited for me, and most impatiently, too. Hark! what's that noise? He's coming through the copse yonder, I know." And the fair speaker sprang forward with childlike eagerness, her face in a glow, every move of her frame thrilling, and a glad light revelling in her soft, azure eyes.

But Ralph Montrose did not emerge from the shadows of the copse, and a shade of disappointment settled over the lady's features.

"Not yet, not yet, Kate," she said, aloud,

"you must wait a little longer. That was but a night-bird stirring the shrubbery."

With these words she sank down on the moss-grown rock, from which she had risen a few moments before, and gave herself up to a pleasant train of thought, for no suspicion of evil had crossed her brain. And was it merely a bird that had made such a loud rustling in the copse? No; concealed by its thick roof of leaves and boughs, a female figure had crouched down to watch and to listen. Not a look, or a motion of the stately Catharine was lost upon the watcher, and at length she left the copse, and stole into the deep shade of a pollard willow so near the maiden that she could have touched her white, gauzy dress. Another hour dragged by, and then Catharine was once more aroused by the musical peal of the old bells.

"Eleven!" she cried, starting to her feet. "O, my God! why has he not come? Can anything have befallen him? It must be so, for he would not willingly disappoint me, whom he says he loves as he never dreamed he was capable of loving." And she began to pace the greensward in extreme agitation.

"You are Catharine Tracy?" muttered a voice in her ear—a voice so hollow, so unearthly, that it chilled the blood in her veins.

She glanced round. There, close beside her, stood a tall, dark, gipsyish woman. Robed in black from head to foot, and with waves of raven hair floating around a dusky face, stormy with warring passions, and lighted up by a pair of dark, wild, lambent eyes, she seemed a strange, ill-omened shadow on the moon-rising of that summer night.

"You are Catharine Tracy?" she said again.

"Yes," gasped the maiden, trembling under the fixed gaze of those fierce eyes.

"And you are awaiting your lover, the young heir of Montrose?" continued the woman.

"Yes, yes, and—and—I am sick at heart because he does not come," faltered Catharine, forgetting in her anxiety, the reserve which was habitual to her in the presence of strangers.

A peculiar smile flickered over the dusky face of her companion, and then faded, leaving the features as rigid as if they had been hewn from marble.

"He will not meet you here to-night, lady," she said, in a hoarse whisper, "he has pressing business to keep him away, but he sends you by me these sweet flowers, and a thousand regrets and good wishes."

As she spoke, she drew forth a small, but exquisite bouquet, wet with dew. Eagerly Catharine's fingers tightened around the gift, but ere she could compose herself sufficiently to speak her thanks, the woman had gone.

"Dear, dear Ralph!" murmured the maiden softly, when she again found herself alone, "I have not waited in vain, for next to his own presence, I value the flowers he sends me." And gathering her light shawl more closely about her, she struck into a narrow path, leading homeward.

In less than half an hour Catharine Tracy had reached her chamber, and sat down to examine her gift by the glow of the crystal lamp on the toilet-stand. Never had she seen such blossoms before; they were curiously shaped, and blood-red in hue, mottled with dashes of golden bronze. The perfume which drifted up from their gorgeous petals was strangely subtle, and yet sweet as the otto, distilled from Cashmere roses. Twisted in among the leaves, was a slip of paper, on which was traced the first written message she had ever received from the heir of Montrose. It ran thus:

"MY OWN CATHARINE,—A London attorney has just arrived at the hall for the purpose of transacting some most important business, and as his time is very, very limited, I find myself forced to forego the pleasure of meeting you at the old trysting place. How my heart rebels against any necessity, which keeps me long from your side. How I yearn to fly to you to-night, to tell you again of my absorbing love for you, and listen once more to the story of your own. But since I cannot come, I send you these flowers; I found them to-day as I was dashing through a mountain gorge in pursuit of a deer. Their beauty is almost as rare as yours; their perfume as sweet as the incense of your love. Accept them as my simple gift—cherish them for my sake, and believe me as ever,

"Devotedly yours, RALPH."

Proud Kate Tracy read this with tears of joy moistening her blue eyes, and lay down to rest with the precious bouquet on her pillow. It was somewhat past midnight, when a tall and closely-muffled form started toward the great, rambling, old manor house of the Tracys, bounded up the balcony steps, and pressed through the half-open window of Kate's room. The chamber was strangely still, and the solemn hush seemed to startle the intruder.

"Great heavens!" she muttered, "how death-like this silence is. She will never wake again! I am too late—too late!"

At that moment Kate Tracy stirred in her slumber; her breath came gasping up, and she began to murmur incoherently. A wild shriek broke from the pallid lips of the mysterious visitor; she sprang to the bedside, and seizing the beautiful sleeper's arm, cried:

"Catharine—Catharine Tracy, rouse ye—rouse ye! Rouse ye, I say!"

A slight tremor passed over the maiden's frame, her drowsy eyes unclosed and wandered with a vacant stare around the apartment. Quick as thought, the intruder snatched the bouquet which had been lying on the pillow, and flung it from the window. Then she turned again toward Catharine, and drawing a quaint flask from the folds of her robe, dashed its contents into her face. Now the pale features began to work convulsively; the orbs beneath that fair brow grew luminous with the light of reason, and Catharine Tracy recognized the woman who had given her those rare flowers, and Ralph's note. As she met her glance, she recalled the pleasure the bouquet had afforded her, and smiled.

"Aha," muttered the stranger, "if you knew all you would not smile on me. Girl, had I not repented of my purpose, you would have been dead in another hour."

"Dead?" gasped Catharine. "O, this must be some horrible dream."

"Nay, nay, it is real enough. Kate Tracy, you have to-night escaped very near dying by my hand!"

She passed, but the maiden was too much shocked to speak, and she went on:

"I was desperate; a demon had taken possession of me, and I shut my ears to the voice of my good genius, and listened only to the tempter. Ralph Montrose did not send you those flowers; I sought them out for you, because I knew their scent was a deadly poison. Your lover never wrote that note—I forged it to mislead you!"

"And why—why did you wish to take my life?" gasped Catharine.

"I had made a mistake—almost a fatal mistake with regard to you. I believed you loved and were beloved by Richard, not Ralph! I thought Richard the heir of Montrose, and when I saw you waiting there under the willow, I madly carried out the vile plan I had formed."

"And how did you discover your error?"

"I will tell you. As I sat by the gipsy camp fire on the hill-side yonder, one of my own race, a person I can trust, came to bring me the tidings that I had been deceived—that my terrible revenge had fallen on the innocent."

"And then you regretted the evil you had done?" said Catharine, inquiringly.

"Regretted! ay, that is too weak a word to express what I felt. My fierce Zincoli blood ceased to boil—my heart seemed to stand still with dread—remorse, like a serpent's tooth, gnawed at my very vitals. I hastened to make reparation; I flew to your chamber with a flask of liquid which had rendered me proof against the poison; I roused you from your trance. And now I leave you, it is not likely that the winding path of the gipsy queen will ever cross yours again. Farewell."

She was about to turn away, when Catharine grasped her hand:

"You say that the note you brought me was forged," she faltered; "but perhaps you have seen Ralph to-night—perhaps you can tell me why he did not keep his appointment?"

The woman shook her head. "No," she replied, "I know nothing about it; I never saw him. It is only a week since I reached England, only twenty-four hours since I encamped with my roving horde among the hills of Westmoreland." She paused, and stood gazing at Kate a few moments, her wistful eyes softening the while. "Girl," she resumed, in a tremulous tone, "when I was concealed in the copse, I heard you murmur to yourself that you had never before waited in vain for your lover. It is no pleasant task to prophesy evil to those whose lives have been like a summer day, but I fear this is merely the beginning of sorrows. Some men are fickle as the changing wind!"

"But Ralph is not one of these—he would not willingly disappoint me."

"You think so now, but you may yet learn the lesson I have learned. I loved his brother Richard with all the wild, passionate devotion of my nature; and O, how entirely I trusted him! Why, I should as soon have believed the stars would fall, as that he could prove faithless. But there came a time—a weary time—when I watched and waited for him in vain. He left Spain without even a cold farewell. Catharine Tracy, the race of Montrose is a false race! Take heed to your young heart—do not love this Ralph too deeply—remember the gipsy queen and her warning!"

The next moment she was gone. Catharine sank back upon her pillow and tried to banish the impression the stranger had produced; but she could not, and ere long she sprang up and hastily robing herself, strayed down into the grounds which lay fair and green around the old manor-house. In the gray dawn of the morning she stood leaning over a wall that divided a barley-field from the high road. She had not been there more than five minutes when the rattling of carriage wheels attracted her attention, and in another instant she saw the London mail-coach sweeping towards her. At first she gave it a careless glance, then every faculty of her being seemed absorbed in the wondering gaze she fixed upon it; she looked through the open window she caught a glimpse of Ralph Montrose. He was very pale, but when he perceived her by the roadside, he started as if a ghost had risen before him; a deep glow shot into his cheek like a plague spot, and he bent on her a wild, wistful look that haunted her long afterwards. Then he drew back into the corner of the vehicle, and Catharine saw another face peering out at her—the dark, bright, bewitching face of a beautiful danseuse, who had come down to Westmoreland to recruit, after the spring campaign at Covent Garden. She and Ralph Montrose were the only occupants of the coach, and a strange pang shot through Catharine's heart, as they dashed past. The gipsy's warning had aroused the demon, Doubt, and now a thousand suspicions began to throng her brain. Ralph had failed to keep his tryst with her, yet there he was in the London mail-coach, with a noted beauty and coquette. Could it be that the piquant French girl had turned the head of the proud heir of Montrose, and made him forgetful of his allegiance to her? Alas! poor Kate Tracy could not answer this query to her own satisfaction, and it was with a heavy heart that she went back to the manor-house.

"Perhaps," she said to herself, after an hour of calm reflection, "perhaps Ralph will come in the course of the day, and explain these mysterious things."

But hours dragged by, and Ralph came not. At length the housekeeper rushed into her room, her face flushed, her plump form in a perfect tremor.

"O, lack a-day! my lady," she cried, "there's such a terrible story afloat—the whole neighborhood is ringing with it."

"Well," rejoined Catharine, "you know I am not over-fond of gossip."

"To be sure, ma'am, I know that," continued the woman, "but this story concerns you more than anybody else—'tis about young Mr. Montrose. They say he got into bad habits while he was on the continent, but that down here in the country and away from temptation he done nicely till he went up to London last spring."

"And what then?" queried the maiden, breathlessly.

"Why, he came across some of his old associates—French gamblers—and played high, and lost, and lost, and lost, till he found himself a ruined man, and was forced to sell his birthright to Mr. Richard to avoid being imprisoned for debt! And—and—" The woman hesitated a moment, and then added, "It's hard to tell you all, my lady—"

"Speak out," cried Catharine, with an impe-rious wave of the hand; "keep nothing back—I can bear it."

"Well, they say, too, that he is going to foreign parts, and left Westmoreland early this morning with—with that bold piece of a dancer who took lodgings at the village inn a month or two ago. Nay, more, ma'am, they whisper it round that he fell in love with her in London, the last time he was there, and that she came here on his account." And now the garrulous house-keeper stopped short, terror-stricken by the wild grief mirrored in Catharine Tracy's pale face. "O, my lady!" she began, after a brief silence, "what can I do for you?"

"Nothing! Leave me alone."

When the door had closed upon the woman, Catharine uttered one shrill cry, and sank senseless to the floor. How long she lay thus she did not know, but when she awoke from her lethargy, darkness had gathered in her chamber, and she could see the stars above the tall poplars which shaded her window. As the recollection of what had just passed came back to her, the wretched girl tried to think of it calmly, but every effort at self-command was in vain; she was weak as a child, and with her head bowed in humiliation and sorrow, she burst into tears. At length she heard a tap at the door, and hastened to open it.

"Young Mr. Montrose is in the parlor," said the old porter.

Catharine's heart gave a sudden bound.

"It was all false," she murmured. "Ralph has come!" And away she glided, flushed and smiling.

But she grew deadly pale again, when, on entering the parlor, she saw Richard, not Ralph Montrose. He advanced to meet her, with a hurried step; she held out her hand in silence, for she was for the moment dumb with grief and disappointment.

"Miss Tracy," he began, in a constrained manner, "I am the bearer of unwelcome tidings. My brother—"

"I—I—I know all," gasped Catharine; "he has bartered his birthright, given up me, his betrothed bride, and left the country with a French ballet-girl!"

"You speak bitterly," rejoined Richard Montrose; "and no wonder that you do. You have been fully wronged, and I could not rest till I had come to tell you how much I regret that a brother of mine should have proved so base!"

A painful silence followed this remark, but finally Kate summoned strength to say:

"I suppose, sir, I ought to thank you for your solicitude; but to-night I am in no mood to talk. Some other time I will discuss the matter."

The young man muttered a confused reply, and bowed himself out of the room, not a little disconcerted at the unsatisfactory termination of the interview. Catharine hastened back to her room, and gave herself up to the storm of passion which came sweeping over her. That night, in the inmost recess of her soul, she made a deep, dark grave, and buried the love she believed dead. That night, too, in her wild agony, the pride which is sometimes born of suffering, arose and began to sit regnant where love had budded, blossomed and withered away. Three days later, she and Richard Montrose again met, and he at once noticed that her manner had more than its olden stateliness. She was the first to broach the subject of Ralph's misconduct.

"Mr. Montrose," she said, firmly, "when I last saw you, I dared not trust myself to speak of your brother's strange course! Since then, I have thought it all over; he is not worthy of a true woman's love! I shall not break my heart for him!"

"Aha!" chuckled Richard, as he left her presence; "the fair Catharine will yet be mine! What love could not do, the proud Tracy spirit will!"

Whether this prophecy proved true, we shall soon see.

"When Ralph bartered his birthright, he offered to abandon all claims to your hand! Little did he think that what he gave up so lightly, seemed to me the greatest treasure in the wide, wide world! O, Kate, if you would but sanction his transfer, my cup of happiness would be full to overflowing!"

The speaker, as our readers will suspect, was none other than Richard Montrose. Months had passed since his brother's flight, and now he stood with Kate Tracy in a rustic porch of the old manor-house. But though he had spoken with such earnestness, the girl remained silent.

"Kate," he continued, "I have loved you from boyhood! Even when you were Ralph's affianced wife, my heart claimed you as its bride elect! My love for you has been the one great passion of my life!"

"Ay, say you so, Richard?" exclaimed Catharine, with a slight vein of irony in her tone. "Did you never in your travels pour a similar confession into other ears?"

"No, upon my honor as a gentleman you are the only woman who can declare with truth that I ever spoke to her of love!"

Catharine hesitated a moment, and then went on to tell him of her meeting with the gipsy queen, and the revelations the strange creature had made. At first he started, and the blood surged to his swart brow in a crimson tide; but he soon regained his composure, and ere Catharine had finished her recital, he was ready with an answer.

"When you began your disclosure, dear Kate," he said, quickly, "I thought it but a foul slander, fabricated by these lying gipseys for some selfish purpose; but now I believe I see through the whole. You know my cousin, Richard Montrose Walsingham. Well, I am sorry to say that while travelling in Spain, the wild fellow got into a flirtation with a beautiful gipsy girl, and fearing the vengeance of her people, laid aside his surname and figured as Richard Montrose. I heard that the infuriated ziacali had followed him to England, and it must have been she who tried to poison you! Are you satisfied?"

"Yes," said Catharine, for his version of the affair, related in such apparent good faith, seemed very plausible; and besides, the present heir of Montrose had been regarded as a man of honor throughout the neighborhood.

"And now, Kate," he resumed, "what answer shall I have to my pleading? May I hope?"

"Hope!" echoed the girl; "not for my love, Richard—I have none to give! But if esteem will content you, I will be yours!"

"Dear, dear Kate," murmured the young man, "I would far rather have your esteem than the love of other women. Henceforth I shall call you my own Catharine!"

Thus Catharine Tracy was betrothed the second time, but all on her part was cold, hollow, formal. There was no bright blush, no sweet smile, no gentle love-light in the proud, calm eyes!

"A pest on that meddling gipsy!" muttered Richard Montrose, as he rode away toward the old hall; "I didn't dream she had grown so desperate. I shall have to be on the look-out, or she will break up the match!"

A wild, scornful laugh greeted his ears at this juncture, and turning, he saw the very person of whom he had been speaking. Her cheek burned, her eyes flashed fire, her thin lip curled and quivered, as she regarded him.

"Ah," she cried; "I understand you now. Thrice, when I came to England, you have deluded me into the belief that you still loved me; but at last I see you as you are. You just said you didn't dream I had grown so desperate. Great heavens! I've had enough to make me desperate—wrong upon wrong, slight upon slight! And I'm not the only one who has resolved that, at this late hour, justice shall be done me. My people are awake!"

"Yes!" exclaimed a sharp-toned voice; and a tall, manly figure stepped forward. "I suppose, Richard Montrose, you thought you could wrong one of our lawless race, and go unpunished. But you shall know to the contrary. You are in our power—marry my slighted sister to-night, or the mystery of the bartered birthright shall be proclaimed from the housetops!"

Richard Montrose trembled; his brain whirled, his sight grew dim.

"Let me think a moment," he faltered.

And the two drew back a little.

"Well," muttered Montrose to himself, "it will not do to have their wrath! By some means, they have pried into my affairs, and it would be utter ruin to have them blazoned to the world. Besides, the mummery of a gipsy marriage is not binding. By my faith, I'll agree to it!"

Three hours later, he was on his way to the gipsy encampment with the chief, while Zuleme, the girl whose love he had won for a pastime, hastened off in advance to make ready for the wedding. It was a glorious May night; the hedgerows were in bloom, the trees clothed with delicate green, and the grass soft and bright, while overhead the stars glittered in pale, serene splendor. The camping-ground of the gipseys looked very picturesque, with the watch-fire blazing high, and the swart zincalei men gathered around.

"Zuleme is in the tent, yonder," said one, "but the bridal procession will soon come forth!"

The next moment the white wall of the tent rolled up, and the gipsy queen emerged, clad in a gorgeous dress of scarlet and blue, and with her graceful head richly garlanded. But with what horror and amazement Richard Montrose gazed at the persons following her! Among the dark-browed gipseys of the tribe, he saw Ralph, with fair Kate Tracy leaning on his arm, and the London official, who had found the Countess of Winterton's bracelet in his step brother's escritoire!

"What—what does all this mean?" he gasped out.

"Mean? Why, that justice is to be done!" cried the officer. "I have seen my error—I am here to confess what I know of your villainy! I am ready to prove, before any court in the kingdom, that you stole the countess's bracelet, hid it in your brother's escritoire, to which you gained access by false keys, and hired me to play a rascally part."

Richard growled an oath, and turned to flee; but the strong arm of a sturdy policeman grasped him, and he heard the words:

"Richard Montrose, you are arrested for theft and fraud!"

"I know now why Ralph bartered his birthright!" said Catharine, moving to his side; "I know, too, that it was by the merest accident the French ballet girl took passage in the same coach with him. I know, too, that it was not lightly he gave me up!"

By this time, the country people had become aware of what was passing at the gipsy encampment, and gathered in crowds on the hillside. They called loudly for "Mr. Ralph," and stepping forward, he said with deep earnestness:

"Friends, I thank God that I can stand before you, and assert that the foul calumnies you have heard are false as the heart which fabricated them. One thing, however, I still regret—it is that in my weak dread of disgrace, I tried to hush up the matter. It would have been a thousand times more worthy of my manhood, to have met it boldly!"

A succession of cheers greeted this remark.

"Another round of cheers for one who deserves them more than I—the gipsy queen!" added Ralph; and again wild shouts went ringing up into the night-sky.

Zuleme's dark eyes grew misty with tears, and turning to Ralph and Catharine, she said:

"When I first came to Westmoreland, my heart was full of mad purposes. But the remorse I felt after having made that attempt to poison you, Kate Tracy, aroused me to a sense of what I was. Since then, I have been a different woman—my gipsy nature has softened! I shall give myself up to revenge no more!"

Then, fixing her keen glance on the foiled Richard Montrose, she muttered:

"Richard, you came hither to see a wedding. You shall not be disappointed! I have learned to love another—a countryman of yours—not wildly, as I loved you, but with a riper, deeper passion."

As she spoke, a sturdy peasant drew her arm within his own and led her to a waiting clergyman, and a few moments afterward, Zuleme left the gipsy camp for a calmer, more rational life.

A month later, amid the jubilant peal of church-bells, the bright flowers strewn by village maidens, and the smiles and blessings of his tenantry, Ralph Montrose led his fair Catharine to the altar, and long, long afterward, by many an English hearth-stone, men, women and children rehearsed the strange story of THE BARTERED BIRTHRIGHT.

THE MEMENTO.

BY EDWARD S. ELLIS.

It lies before me, like the pearl
 Rescued from crystal ocean's cave,
 This long forgotten, golden curl,
 That speaks of one beyond the grave.

There is within it still a gleam
 Of years that long, ah, long have flown—
 A time when life was all a dream,
 When its great sorrows were unknown.

Far back upon the waste of life,
 A cherished, mournful spot appears,
 Divided from this scene of strife
 By a long, empty aisle of years.

One summer eve that curl was placed Within my trembling, waiting hand,
 And time the words have ne'er effaced:
 "We meet again in yonder land."

He died, and now is waiting there
 Until my sands of life have run,
 Until that land seems not afar,
 And life's sad work is well nigh done.

THE DUMB PAINTER OF LOGRÓN.

BY WILLIAM B. OLIVER.

THE warm, glowing afternoon of a Spanish day was waning to its sunset; and the dimness of the room, where Maraquita was sitting, was lighted up by little flecks of western rays that came through the lattices and played upon her white dress and the cool white of the marble floor.

She was sitting upon a couch of light construction, the whole being twisted from canes; while her small feet, with their delicate silken slippers, were resting upon another couch of the same material. Around her swept the waves of her long black hair, which she was coiling and uncoiling alternately—now gathering the heavy masses into one or two long, rich braids, and then flinging down the wreath of tresses, until they covered her like a bridal veil.

The poor little Spanish maiden was evidently ill at ease. The elastic lounge, upon which her slender figure was supported, swayed and bent with her nervous movements; and the pet dog that lay beside her, vainly trying to lick her hand, seemed astonished that it would not lie still long enough for the operation.

"What can I do, Max?" she said, addressing the dog. "I am a silly little maiden, and I dread to have it found out that I am so. Here are my good father and mother, in whose eyes I have been all perfection, and who thought that even this grandiose Don Carlos was not more than half good enough for me, will now believe that the spirit of evil has taken me. Max, you are a good dog, but I don't believe you have wit enough to get poor Maraquita de Mona out of this difficulty."

Max laid his paw upon her arm, closed and unclosed his eyes, and looked as wise as some others might, when expecting a tale of confidence from a young damsel; but Maraquita's playful mood had passed, and she rose and paced the room with restless steps.

By this time, the sun had sunk out of sight; and the voice of Don Albert de Mona, calling to his daughter to be ready for a drive to the Plaza, was heard, as he descended the stairs and knocked at the door.

"Not to-night, father," she answered; "I am ill. My head aches horribly. Pray excuse me! I will remain here quietly until you and my mother return."

"Well, the afternoon has been sultry. Lie down and rest while we are absent. Shall I call your maid?"

"No, father; I do not need her. I shall be better alone."

Better alone! Ah, Donna Maraquita! thy poor father is deceived, but then cannot hide it to thyself that it is only to see the handsome painter of Logrón, that thou sittest braiding thy midnight hair—only to watch him, as he comes down the street in the twilight, and as he looks up with eager glance at the lattice, to throw a moss rose-bud at his feet. Thou knowest, too, that at that token, he will venture to enter thy presence, and that his lips will greet thee as the one dearest to his heart. Not with words will be that greeting, but with another language, always understood—the language of kisses.

No, not with words—for the painter, Navarrete, is both deaf and dumb! But there is no need of words for lovers. At any rate, I knew a married couple, who, when they were lovers, sat all day, and almost every day, at a window, looking straight into each other's eyes, and not uttering a word. And so with these two! They met and parted, with only the soul's telegraphic signals, and they needed no echo from the lips.

Donna Maraquita had been invited by a friend, some months before, to visit the studio of Don Fernandez Ximenes Navarrete, to see a beautiful painting of the Virgin which he had recently executed. This young painter, who was called El Mudo, from his misfortune, was rapidly gaining fame; and this very painting was the great stepping-stone to public favor. The excitable Spaniards warmed with enthusiasm at the beauty of the head, which was said to have been copied from that of the artist's mother, Donna Catalina Ximenes.

Among the many who visited the picture, were Don Albert and his daughter. The beauty of the painting, the filial, admiring reverence of the artist in taking his mother's head as a model, the "silent world" in which he lived, all wrought upon the susceptible imagination of the young girl, and from thenceforward, El Mudo was associated in all her dreams.

On his part, he had seen a vision of beauty such as he thought he had never before beheld; and yet it must have been only the sympathetic and cordial manner of Donna Maraquita that induced the thought—for although she was indeed noble-looking, and with a grace blended with dignity, yet so had many others.

Again and again she came, sometimes accompanied by her father, but oftener alone; and at last, the painter was delighted to find that she could converse freely with him in the deaf and dumb alphabet. With what joy he now related to her his whole life—its mournful childhood and youth, when no sound of bird or breeze or human voice could reach his ear! and how he used to go wandering for whole days, through picture galleries, until the idea seized upon him that he too must paint! and how that, ever since that hour, he had lived in a higher and more exalted sphere, and was no longer the lonely man, apart from his fellow-creatures, but that his art was the one grand link that bound him and them together.

And what more did Fernandes impart? He told her, too, that the moment he saw her, he felt that she was to be the connecting one between him and happiness.

"And yet how—O, how can I take you from the living, speaking music of the world and bind you to the speechless silence that ever surrounds me?"

Her trembling fingers telegraphed to his mind that she sought no higher destiny. It was enough for the affectionate girl, that he loved her. She would give worlds that his lips could speak; but her love could never be lessened because they were silent.

But how to break the tidings to her parents, was now the grand object of her solicitude; and on this very night, she had promised Fernandes that it should be told them. He came at the twilight, held a brief interview with her, and then left her to tell what he felt it impossible for him to make them comprehend.

When Don Albert and his wife returned, they heard all from the lips of the trembling girl.

Tenderly as they loved her, they could not give her up to a fate like this. They entreated her not to give him any hope; their decision now could never be reversed. Maraquita yielded to their tears, what she could not have done to their commands; but the storm in her soul was no less severe. Her parting with Fernandez, the next day, was a terrible scene. The sight of his dumb and powerless anguish was more affecting than the most impassioned speech. The only consolation which he could receive, was the solemn assurance of her continued affection.

They parted—Maraquita to her lonely room, which no persuasion could induce her to leave, and Fernandez to the country villa, where his mother lived in quiet grandeur; for it was not poverty that induced her son to paint, but to fill the time hanging so wearily upon a person with his privation.

All the comfort which the mother could impart to his mute agony, was given; but the wound was deep and lasting. He had no time, however, to give to grief; for he was summoned to Madrid, by Philip II., and appointed painter to the king, with a pension of two hundred ducats. Here he painted the Shepherds announcing the birth of our Saviour; and his representation of them was so exquisite, that every one exclaimed, "What beautiful shepherds!" This exclamation afterwards became the name of this painting, it being everywhere known as the "Beautiful Shepherds."

Still Maraquita mourned, in almost utter loneliness, the loss of her lover. Still did Donna Catalina cherish bitterness towards her whom she could not acquit of coquetry towards her innocent and unfortunate son. Every one concerned in the affair was unhappy. Don Albert and his wife were miserable, for although Maraquita made no complaint, her pale, thin face was a perpetual reproach, and her refusal to go into company distressed and annoyed them.

Maraquita had heard of the appointment, but she heard, also, that Fernandez had again left Madrid. She did not know why; but one evening a courier brought her a note from Donna Catalina, couched partly in bitter and partly in humble terms, informing her that her son, "whom her cruelty had nearly destroyed," was lying dangerously ill, and that she must come and look upon the wreck she had made. It closed with a frantic entreaty to come immediately. She showed it to her father, and he could not resist the pleading look which she gave him. A few moments later, they were on the road with a pair of horses that seemed almost to fly.

The mute appeal of that sorrow-stricken face, that lay upon the pillow, almost unmanned Don Albert. He marked the agony of his daughter, and the proud, stately grief of Fernandez's beautiful mother; and he asked himself if he could bestow aught upon either, from his wealth, that could compensate for the anguish of this hour. One word from him would bring back joy to all. Should he speak it? Could he give up his cherished hope of seeing Maraquita the wife of one of the proud Spanish grandees, and allow her to marry a painter? Yet everything here betokened wealth and the utmost refinement—almost, indeed, to fastidiousness.

He did speak that word. His daughter uttered a glad shriek, Donna Catalina pressed his hand to her heart and wept happy tears, and the mute sufferer, himself, was not slow to comprehend the general happiness. They were soon united, never more to be separated until death.

No cloud ever came over that perfect and enduring love. The noble Spanish wife devoted her time, her talents, and her affections wholly to him whom she loved, and almost ceased to regret that she could not hear the voice when the eyes were so eloquent.

Still did his mother's beautiful and noble face look out from his canvass, but Maraquita's, never. It was in his heart too deeply, to bring it to the gaze of the world. He kept it there, shrined and holy, as one keeps a patron saint within the bosom's innermost depths. Who shall fathom that mute, unexpressed love, that needs not speak to declare it? Let us thank God that the lips that here are dumb, shall in his good time break forth into the highest music, mingling with the songs of angels; that when "there is heard a great noise, like a multitude of voices," THE DUMB PAINTER OF LOGRONO will join the rapturous shout.

LOOK ON THE BRIGHT SIDE.

It was old Izaak Walton who said, "Every misery that I miss is a new mercy;" a saying worthy of the profoundest philosopher. It is only too true that misfortunes come to us on wings, but retire with a limping pace; and yet one half the world are ready to meet calamities half way, and indirectly to welcome them. There is scarcely an evil in life that we cannot double by pondering upon it; a scratch will thus become a serious wound, and a slight illness even be made to end in death, by the brooding apprehension of the sick; while on the other hand, a mind accustomed to look upon the bright side of all things, will repel the mildew and dampness of care by its genial sunshine. A cheerful heart paints the world as it sees it, like a sunny landscape; the morbid mind depicts it like a sterile wilderness.

O, JESSIE DO YOU REMEMBER?

BY H. B. ANDERSON, M. D.

O, Jessie, do you remember
The cottage in the vale,
Where the woodbine brightly blossomed,
And the ivy used to trail?
Where rills as softly murmured,
In the valley where we met,
As love's first holy token
We pledged to ne'er forget.

O, Jessie, do you remember
The hour when first we met?
'Twas spring, and 'neath the myrtle,
We pledged to ne'er forget—
Vows of eternal friendship,
Ay, yet more, eternal love,
As the stars so brightly twinkled,
From their silent homes above.

Ay, Jessie, you well remember
The calm and holy eve;
With hand and heart we pledged
Undying love to give.
The stars, they bore us witness
To the sacred vows that eve,
And angels hovered o'er us,
As the holy pledge we gave.

Ah, Jessie, has your faith been true
To those pledges of the dale—
Or, did the heart grow cold and chill,
As wealth's degrees have failed?
When glittering gold enchain'd the soul,
Allurements cast their glare—
Ah, then it was, O, Jessie, then,
You were so bright, so fair.

But, Jessie, when misfortune's frown
Cast sorrows round my paths—
When the cot, within the shaded vale,
Had shown Time's withering blasts—
When the stars that bore us witness once,
But dimly twinkle from afar,
Then, Jessie, ah, that sacred pledge,
To me was blighted—aye!

That cot is still within the vale,
Those rills still murmuring flow—
The ivy trailing yet as then,
The stars as brightly glow.
I oft beneath the myrtle grove,
Where Jessie's vows were made,
In meditation's holy hour,
Muse o'er the hope there stayed.

Thy cot now stands, in another vale,
Where other rills now flow—
And other flowers sweetly bloom,
Where other myrtles grow.
Thou dwelt'st beneath those twinkling stars,
That shone when first we met—
But, Jessie, ah! say, how can you
Those sacred vows forget?

The best bank ever known, is a bank of earth; it never refused to discount to honest labor. And the best share, is the ploughshare—on which dividends are always liberal.

NANNIE GRAY.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

"I'll never speak to you again, Howard Ross, so long as I live—never!"

She said it with a bewitching air of anger, and such a flash of her brilliant eyes as might have sent a less susceptible man than myself down on his knees before her.

"Why-e-e-e, Nannie Gray, you don't mean it. That little, chattering tongue of yours couldn't keep still half an hour if it tried."

Another flash of the bewildering blue eyes, so quick and bright it almost dazzled me. That was all the response she deigned. A few minutes' persevering silence followed.

"Nannie."

No answer.

"Nannie Gray."

A haughty toss of the crown of golden curls, and a firm shutting together of the crimson lips.

I had my labor for my pains. A stagnant frog-pond, with all the frogs faintest away couldn't have been stiller than she. The facts of the case were simply these. I was in love with the little, saucy, bright eyed, deliciously charming, inexpressibly bewitching, tormentingly coquetish Nannie Gray. In love, bewilderingly, irrevocably, madly, no-help-for-it-at-all-ably, in love, heart, mind, soul and sense, head and ears. Being a passably good-looking, well-informed young gentleman, of agreeable manners, easy nature, generous disposition, good character, fair name, unquestionable habits, well-to-do father, brilliant prospects, and all the other little etceteras which a modest man like myself would dislike to mention; having arrived at that respectable stage of single blessedness when a man begins to feel like half a pair of shears, and commences looking about him for some one who will love, cherish and obey, and darn his stockings; moreover, being entirely satisfied that the aforesaid Nannie Gray was abundantly qualified to make me the happiest of men, and a little extra bliss to boot; and, thinking withal, that she, Nannie, being an orphan and alone in the world, needed just such a nice husband as I should make, indulgent, even-tempered, handsome, etc., etc., to protect her, I had arrived at the unavoidable determination to offer her my heart, hand, fortune, and the name of Ross.

I had the audacity to believe that she was not altogether insensible to my attractions; that the mercury of her affections stood about the same number of degrees above zero that mine did. There was this difference, however. Whereas

I made no secret of my affection for her, but told her of it every chance I could get, the arrant little coquette had a way peculiarly her own of making me uncomfortable. In the midst of my most eloquent love declarations, she would ask me if I ever wore a scarlet jacket, and travelled as an accompaniment to a hand organ. If I pressed her hand she would laugh.

One day I caught her looking very intently at the inside of a gold locket, said locket being dependent from a slender chain that trembled about her white throat like little pulsations of sunshine. She gave a little, pretty, theatrical start of surprise upon being discovered looking at it, clasped it quickly, and hid it in her bosom. I whistled. (I always whistle when I don't know what else to do.) For the first time in my life I was jealous. Very unconcernedly Nannie took up her sewing. Knowing it wouldn't do to let her notice my discomfiture, I grasped the morning paper, and held it before my face. Couldn't see anything but little gold lockets all over it. Heard a suppressed laugh, and knew Nannie saw through my uneasiness at once. Whistled again, and glanced over the top of the paper at Nannie. She caught me at it, and laughed outright.

"Wouldn't you read with less difficulty, if you held the paper differently, Mr. Ross?"

Mr. Ross! I looked down. Zounds, reader! I had the paper wrong end upwards. I sprang from my chair as though a dozen grown-up thunder bolts had exploded in my boots. Nannie was sewing again, grave and dignified as a queen. I seized my hat and left. When about half way down the road, thought I heard a laugh. Looked about. Nannie sat by the window, locket in hand, her sewing tossed idly across the window-seat. I grated my teeth, and walked along. For two or three successive days, that locket tormented me. She always managed to be hiding it, when I came along. At last, she became less shy, and looked at it continually in my presence. One morning I sat watching her. How sweetly she smiled at the despicable, little yellow affair. I could have shaken her with a good will. Then she sighed, bent her face down suspiciously low. A smile, a smack, a triumphant uplifting of her saucy eyes—gracious, she had missed it! Human nature could endure no more. Curiosity, tantalizing, jealous curiosity, overcame every consideration of politeness. Forgetting the rudeness of the action, I sprang forward and snatched the locket from her hand. She gave a faint cry of alarm, and struggled to rescue it from me; but I caught both her eager hands in mine, and held them fast, while I turned to look at the miniature. I set my features in a glare of defiance intended for the especial benefit of the masculine visage I expected to see there. O, confusion thrice confounded! the locket was an empty one! I relinquished my bold of it, and glanced at Nannie. Cheek, forehead, and ivory-white throat were deluged with crimson, while two tears of mingled indignation and chagrin struggled through the misty fringe of her lashes.

"I was very rude; forgive me, Nannie."

Such a stamp of her slender foot upon the carpet! Such a queenly straightening of her fairy figure! Such a blazing of her glorious eyes! I stood back aghast.

"I'll never speak to you again, Howard Ross, as long as I live—never!"

That was what she said. I have already recorded my unsuccessful attempts to change her resolution. And yet I had gone to her, intending to place my happiness in her hands—intending to say to her what no other woman had ever won from my lips. Of course I relinquished the idea then. An army of hungry bears would have been less formidable than Nannie Gray in such a pet. I went home laboring under the conviction that either I was a brute, and Nannie an angel, or Nannie was a little vixen, and myself an abused, uncomfortable and stupid fellow.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, Howard Ross," I muttered. "Fie on such ungentlemanly conduct! Any woman of spirit would have resented it. You've not half got your deserts, even if she should keep her cruel threat of never speaking to you again—which she wont," I added, by way of consoling myself. That was the most uneasy forenoon I ever passed, without a single exception. I tried to read, to pass away the time. The paper blurred all over with Nannie Gray's yellow curls and blue eyes. Thought I'd smoke. Sat down with that intention, and after half an hour's vigorous puffing, discovered that I had omitted to light my cigar, an important consideration, as all smokers will testify. At dinner, surprised myself purloining the soup-ladle, and attempting to stir my tea with it, beside numerous other follies, such as buttering my bread on both sides, and calling for vinegar on my pudding. The first part of the afternoon passed about as satisfactorily. I worried through an hour or two, and finally decided to go a gunning, though there was nothing to shoot in the neighborhood but birds and field rats, if I excepted dogs, hens and cats, game I never molested. I threw my rifle across my shoulder, and took the nearest path to the woods. There were daisies growing all along the path, nodding and swaying their yellow-hearted blossoms vainly. I imagined they looked a trifle like so many little gold lockets stuck upon stems, and kicked at them spitefully as I went along. Reached the woods at last, the cool, breezy, delicious woods. A perfect bower of comfort I found them, after my long walk over sandy roads, with the merciless pelting of a July sun at my back. A perfect bower of comfort; green niches of shade, luxurious mounds of velvety moss—miniature wilderness of tangled vines, waving trees, murmuring brook, cool breeze—I was in raptures. Leaned my rifle up against a friendly tree, and looked about me. Something caught my eye a few rods off—something bright, glittering, round and yellow, lying close to a thicket of ivy that climbed and ran in a sort of fantastic trellis-work from one large tree to another. Thought I'd see what it was. Went forward, stooped down—torment and fairies!—a gold locket! Set my foot on it with a growl. Meant to crush it, but didn't. A bed of yielding moss saved it. Bent down to pick it up, and found it was attached to a chain. Gave the chain a little pull, but it resisted my efforts. Saw that one end of it was tangled in the ivy. Pushed the leaves apart to find it. Jupiter, Jovi, Jovis, Jovum! I started back in surprise. I had found the other end of the chain indeed, but my hand came in contact with a white, warm neck inside of it. Crushed down among the trailing festoons of ivy, her daintily slippered feet just peeping from the folds of her muslin dress, and one round, white arm beneath her head, with a billow of golden ringlets flowing over it, like sunlight across ivory, lay Nannie, Gray fast asleep! Her gipsy hat was beside her, running over with blossoms. Dear Nannie! Such a picture of unconscious loveliness and girlish innocence! Who could have helped loving her?

I wondered if she was still angry with me, and wonder begat a sudden thought, a desperate resolve. I would try her. I went back where my rifle was standing, raised it deliberately, and fired—don't be alarmed, reader—into the air! Then I staggered, groaned, and fell. A first-class tragedian couldn't have acted his part more thoroughly. The report, the groan, the fall, had their intended effect. Heavens! what a spring Nannie gave! I had flung myself down on my left side, with one arm thrown up so as partially to conceal my face. But my fingers were arranged to accommodate my eyes; of course, I peeped through them.

I saw Nannie stand for a moment in a perplexed attitude, drawing her hand across her eyes, as if to assure herself she was not still asleep. Then her glance fell where I was lying.

A quick pallor spread over her features, and with a faint cry of alarm, she knelt beside me.

"Howard—Howard! What is the matter? Are you injured? How did it happen? Who has shot you?" were her terrified inquiries.

I gave another groan, more heart-rending than the first.

"Howard, dear, dear, Howard, speak to me! What is the matter?"

The words came thick and broken, as if fear choked her utterance. I opened my eyes half way, rolled them wildly in my head, writhed, as though suffering the most acute pain, and groaned a third time.

She sprang up with a suddenness that startled me; ran for her gipsy hat, emptied it of its flowers, darted toward the brook, scooped it up full of water, and was back again with the cool moisture dripping over her hat-brim, and through the coarse braid upon her frock, before I comprehended her movement. Then she knelt and dipping her soft hand in the water, bathed my forehead and temples.

"Howard!" she called again. "Howard, in mercy's name, speak to me!"

But I didn't speak—not I. With that soft, cool, caressing hand fluttering so deliciously across my face, how could I? What man could have been unselfish enough to put an end to a deception that brought such charming results? She paused at last, as if her task were a hopeless one, and drew my head up tenderly upon her shoulder—a shoulder white and plump, and dimpled as a babe's. She wound her slender arms about my neck, laid her velvety cheek to mine, pressed her dewy lips over and over again to my forehead.

"O, he will die—he will die! He will never speak to me again—never forgive me for getting so angry—never tell me again that he loves me! Howard, Howard, darling! my love, my life! In pity speak to me. Look up. Forgive me, kiss me, love me! O, this is dreadful—dreadful—dreadful!"

Lying there, half-supported in the soft clasp of her tremulous arms, with her silken curls rippling like a cloud of amber mist about my forehead—her lips to mine—her balmy breath drifting across my cheek, I could have wished the deception carried on forever. But the quick heaving of her bosom, the burst of passionate sobs, the falling of hot tears, told me how deeply and truly she had suffered. I was melted to repentance in an instant, and opening my eyes glanced up full in her face.

"Do you then love me so very much, Nannie?"

She sprang up instantly, staring at me with parted lips and dilating eyes. Her wonderment was not of long duration, however, for the triumph that trembled through my voice as I spoke, and the merry laughter I found it impossible to restrain, explained the whole story to her in an instant. How bitterly I reproached myself for the cruel jest, when I saw the hot flushes of wounded pride dash across her features. Tears of mortification struggled to her eyes, her lips quivered, her head drooped with bashful pain. Shocked, grieved, startled, she stood thus for a moment, like a frightened bird, uncertain whether to weep or fly, and then I rose up and went towards her. With a single rapid glance into my face—a glance which was a strange mixture of tenderness, reproach, affright and maiden modesty, she darted away. Her foot caught, she stumbled, and would have fallen; but with a bound I had her in my arms, and held her down, struggling, weeping, panting, upon my breast.

Her sobs smote me like so many swords. The frightened throbbing of her heart punished me as no angry reproaches could have done. Ashamed and repentant, I poured a torrent of wild words into her ear—a mingling of passionate love vows, bitter self-upbraidings, caressing epithets, tender soothing and vehement pleadings for forgiveness. She made me no answer, but lay in my close embrace, passive and unresisting. I lifted her face from my shoulder, to see if I might read an answer there. She hid it quickly in her hands. With a gentle force, I unclasped the trembling fingers. What an April face was revealed to me! Grief, girlish shame and mirth contended for the mastery. Smiles dimpled the mouth, blushes suffused the cheeks, tears glittered on the drooping lashes—a beautiful trinity of emotions—dazzling sunlight, rosy clouds, starry rain.

"Look up, Nannie, darling. Am I forgiven?"

The lids were lifted from the radiant eyes a moment, and then suddenly lowered again. I was answered. Two pearly drops, startled from her lashes by the motion, trembled and fell upon her cheek. With true lover like gallantry, I stooped to kiss them off. Shades of Cupid! My moustache caught the tears, and my ears—such a boxing!

Nannie wears her gold locket yet, but my face is inside it now. Whether I have ever caught her kissing it since that important addition is a secret between her and me. She retains to this day all her old spirit of coquetry, though I speak from some half-a-dozen years' experience, when I say that she makes just the dearest little wife in all Christendom.

SONG.

BY W. W. CALDWELL.

The green leaves rustle far and near,
The flowerets bloom again,
And from the nightingale I hear
The old delicious strain.
O happy he whose heart may feel
The bliss that spring-time can reveal!

Through wood and field I'd gladly go,
And with the wild birds sing,
While thus with happiness I know
The whole wide world doth ring;
But what for song and floweret care,
Since thou art wanting everywhere?

O friend beloved! and shall I see
Thy gentle face no more!
Then is the spring-time lost to me,
Its joy, its beauty o'er.
For ah! what pleasure can there be
What is a spring-time without thee?

THE LAST OF THE VESPUCCI

BY MAURICE A. LINCOLN.

"One flight higher," said the voice of childhood, as some men were bearing up a plain deal coffin. A boy of twelve years was guiding them to the place, and as they reached the last landing, he opened a door and bade them enter. On an old-fashioned high bedstead lay a man, evidently still young, stricken down by death while he was yet in his summer of life. Around the bed sat the widow and children; four young girls, each younger than the boy who had showed the way hither.

"Had you not better retire to some other room, while we perform this duty?" said the kind-hearted mechanic, as he prepared the coffin for the reception of the dead.

"We have none other," answered the widow, "and if we had, this will be no harder than to see him die."

She flung her arms once more around the body, and kissed the pale lips passionately, then rising, she leaned against the window and wept bitterly. The children seemed stunned at the sorrow which had fallen upon them, and neither spoke nor moved. The widow wept on, until the whole was over, and the lid screwed upon the coffin. All at once she fell to the floor. On raising her up, the men found that she was covered with the blood which was flowing fast from her purple lips. One of them ran out for a surgeon, but before he arrived she had ceased breathing. She was a delicate and beautiful woman, and had looked ill able to bear the sorrow and poverty that brooded over the desolate looking room. God had seemed kindly to take her away from its burden, and lead her into peace. But these poor, lonely children, who would supply the place of father and mother to them?

After the double funeral was over, the family began to look for some way of support. It is fortunate that the climate of Florence makes the means of living so cheap. There is little or no fire needed, and a few pauls buy all the food that will nourish one person for a week.

The boy, Amerigo, soon got employment suited to his age. With the girls it was more difficult. But Ellena went to tend in a bazaar, and Julia began to give lessons in music, and Blanche and Leonora became silk-winders; and ere many weeks they were all employed upon something, though with scanty pay, yet still enough to keep them from absolute want. It had not been always thus. Amerigo Vespucci had once been the friend of princes, the chosen companion of high and noble men. But one misfortune after another had befallen him, until his proud heart sought only to bury itself in retirement, so that the world might not know how sorely he had been brought low. He fled from society, and not a person who knew him was permitted to assist him in his poverty. In the little garret in which we found him, he had lived and died a martyr to sensibility, and too proud, even on his death-bed, to allow any one to be called in. Had his wife lived, her true mother's heart would not have scrupled to ask aid for her children, but she, too, was taken away. One treasure came down to them, which in one sense was a most valuable possession. It was the portrait of their ancestor, the far famed navigator—the discoverer of America. This was their inheritance, all, indeed, that was left them. No bad inheritance either is the pictured semblance of one who has earned such high honor as he; but they did not place the high value upon it which their father had done. Still, they prized it enough to take it into good hands; and they placed it with a friend who had a more suitable place for it than they possessed.

Ellena Vespucci, the eldest of these children, was a bright, bold, handsome girl, as unlike her mother and gentle sisters as possible. Her position was one which exposed her to publicity, and the bold and undisguised admiration which was paid to her beauty, soon swept away every trace of delicacy or refinement in her manners. At an early age, she contrived in some way to mix herself up with a certain set, which if not exactly respectable, was still popular and extremely gay. Every art was tried to enhance her beauty and to gain new conquests. The rest of the family remained in great indigence, while she by some means or other was living in luxury. As years went on, and the eldest sister became the source of shame and mortification to her pure and innocent sisters, after vainly trying to bring her back to a sense of the wrongs she was inflicting upon them, they separated from her altogether. Amerigo procured a situation under the government of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, but with a compensation that would scarcely find our American boys in cigars.

When Ellena left them, she represented that she was going to America, to ask government for a grant for her family, on account of their ancestor's discovering the new world. They entrusted her therefore with the relics in possession of the family, which they would never have parted with under any other circumstances. With these, she went to Paris, where she was received at court, and for a while she was triumphant. But she carried her dissipations so far that even the French could endure her no longer, and she was obliged to leave Paris abruptly, where, for a short space, her personal charms had blinded many to her false and mercetricious character.

From thence, the young adventuress went to South America, and besieged the governments there to make her an appropriation, either of lands or money. Whether her style of manners was repulsive to the South Americans, or that they regarded her claims as simply ridiculous, is not known. At all events, she met with no very flattering ovation for such an accomplished actress.

Her last bold attempt at falsehood seemed likely to become successful. Arrived at the capital, she made her debut as the only surviving descendant of Americus Vespuccius! Not a word of the brother and three sisters who were too good and unsuspecting to believe that whatever might be her social sins, she could not thus wantonly deny their existence, and claim the appropriation which a generous republic might make to the last of the Vespucci. But Ellena was an accomplished actress; and how well she wrought upon the sympathies of the many must not be forgotten. They who were most interested in the charming beggar must remember her with not a little mortification, and ought not to forget that while every nerve was strained to accomplish her ends, the poor descendants of our own heroic countrymen were dying for want of the aid which should have been extended to them from a grateful nation.

These are the hard, bare facts which underlie the romance that attaches to the name of Vespucci; although enough still remains to excite sufficient interest. Not for one dark spot in their escutcheon should all be condemned; and the worthy brother and sisters, who have not the assurance to stand up and ask an American Congress for a million acres of land, must not forget the respect of our own country that is due to their character as well as to their birth. While the insolent assumption of the intriguing Ellena has been rebuked, let not the pure and innocent sisters who have suffered through her matchless falsehood and impudence, be heartlessly classed with her who is a shame and disgrace to the family of Vespucci.

"Alas that things so fair should be so—false!"

THE NERVOUS SYSTEM.

In one of M. Brown Sequard's lectures, he exhibited guinea pigs which had been experimented on some months ago by cutting certain nerves; the hinder limbs became paralyzed, but in time the animals recovered the power of voluntary motion, attended, however, with a very curious result—the operator could put them into a fit of epilepsy whenever he pleased. It appears that by the cutting of the nerves, the animals lose sensation except in one cheek, and if that spot is irritated, a fit is the immediate consequence. Another noticeable particular is, that the lice which infest the animals congregate on that spot, and nowhere else. It is probable that there is more warmth, or more perspiration than on other parts of the body, is not known; at any rate, physiologists are agreed as to the singular and suggestive nature of the phenomenon. It appears, moreover, that if the sensibility of the sensitive spot be destroyed, then the guinea pig ceases to be liable to epilepsy. Applying this fact to human physiology, M. Brown Sequard says that there is in the human body a spot, discoverable, as he believes, by galvanism, which, if deprived of its sensibility, would in like manner completely prevent attacks of epilepsy.—Chambers' Journal.

A TURKISH BEAUTY.

It is quite true that a Turkish beauty—really a beauty—"strikes you all of a heap," as the sailors say. The princess sat, bending slightly forward in the carriage, her "gazelle eyes" resting thoughtfully on a Turkish fan of snow-white feathers, which she held in her hand, the centre of which was entirely of emeralds and diamonds,—slight as a fairy,—the exquisite tint of her skin, seen through the misty white veil, just the hue of a shell where it approaches pink. The delicate robe of palest sea-green, and the wreath of diamonds trembling round her head like splendid drops of water in a charmed crown, instantly reminded me of Undine in her softest mood, travelling in the rich but fantastic equipage to visit some great River Queen on shore for the day.—Mrs. Hornby's Stamboul.

THERE'S LOVE IN THE COLDEST HEART.

BY BEATRICE.

Say what you will of the coldness of man,
Of his soul deeply trammelled by art;
Still, let me believe through it all, if I can,
That there's love in the coldest heart.

Could we read the secrets of every soul,
Know the motives which prompted the deed,
Less oftener our tongues would herald the scroll,
Over which hearts silently bleed.

I cannot think man so utterly lost,
But what he has moments of shame,
Though reckless at times, still, deep in his soul
There is burning a holier flame.

Some mem'ry is playing with his heart's silent strings,
Some blissful emotion is stirred,
Some hope of the blessed, to which his soul clings,
Though his lips may utter no word.

Every soul has its griefs, every bosom its cares,
So 'twill be till this life shall depart;
Then let me believe, while life's burden it bears,
That there's love in the coldest heart!

THE MYSTERIOUS LETTER.

BY NED ANDERTON.

At precisely five minutes to ten one pleasant summer's morning, a smart servant girl "might have been seen" laying breakfast in the dining-room of a pretty villa near London. From the unusual celerity of said servant-girl's movements, as well as the slightly disordered appearance of the apartment, the chairs being loaded down with open carpet-bags, corded boxes, brown paper parcels, etc., etc., it might reasonably be inferred that a journey of some consequence was meditated. Such was actually the case. Mr. and Mrs. Felix Summerly, the proprietors of this rural retreat, were intending to take a little journey.

"Jane, Jane," called a masculine voice outside the French windows that opened to the garden in the rear, "breakfast ready?"

"Directly, sir."

"Lucinda, my dear."

"Yes, Felix," responded a voice of the feminine gender.

"Only five minutes to ten. Remember, we must get to the docks; and at eleven exactly we start."

Here the window was darkened by the entrance of Mr. Summerly, loaded down with cloak, pale-tot, umbrella, fishing-rod, and hat case, which he deposited on the sofa.

"Jane," he inquired, "has the tailor sent?"

"Not yet, sir."

"Man brought a telescope?"

"No, sir, he hasn't."

"Nor a box from the print-sellers?"

"No, sir, there's nothing."

"Well, that'll do. Breakfast! breakfast! Confound those fellows," he soliloquized as Jane departed, "I said ten at farthest—told 'em the boat started at half past, but they leave all till the last minute, out of spite at seeing other folks happy, I do believe. Precious sharp run though, to start for the Rhine at half a day's notice. Hadn't a thought of it until three o'clock yesterday, when Willet came up to me, and said in his free and easy manner, 'Summerly, what do you say to taking my leave?' 'Your leave, sir?' said I—I always 'sir' a senior. 'Yes,' he replied, 'I'm off you know, to-morrow, and it's exquisite weather, just the thing for a trip.' 'You're joking, sir,' said I. 'Not at all,' said he, 'I'm perfectly serious, as there's reason I should be. I've got some law business to keep me in town, that may cost me some hundreds if I'm out of the way, so what do you say to taking my leave, and letting me take yours? And I don't mind allowing you my extra fortnight.' There's a noble fellow! I said 'done,' of course—was off at once, ran to my bankers for a letter of credit—then home to Lucinda, and told her to pack; and packing we were till most daylight."

At this moment Mrs. Summerly entered, completely loaded down with dresses, boots, and a dressing case.

"Why, Felix," she said, "have you finished?"

"Yes, all but breakfast; packed all but myself."

"Well, it's no use; I never can get ready. I've a load of things yet and not a cranny to put them in."

And she demonstrated this assertion by several futile attempts to force a tiny package into her valise.

"O, nonsense, my love, nonsense; all you want is a little extra decision."

"Not at all; what I want is a little extra portmanteau."

"Well, you keep at work, and I'll pour the tea out. Jane, Jane, are you coming?"

Mrs. Summerly continued at the open trunk, and Jane hurried in with a tray, containing breakfast equipage, toast, eggs, etc.

"'Pon my word, Jane, you are a spry one! Talk of the telegraph when you're round about! Post come yet?"

"No, sir."

"Well, where's the ham? That's not come, either! Do you call this your general delivery?"

At sight of the raised empty plate, Jane again departed, while her master arranged himself to commence the meal. Meanwhile Mrs. Summerly was muttering to herself in despair:

"No, it's not the least use, whatever; I shall ruin this dress, eh? Why, there's his valise, not a quarter full yet, its mouth gaping wide open, as if asking to be fed. His handkerchief at the top," she continued, examining the contents, "the very thing for my boots—now they won't be jammed; and here's room for my desk between his pantaloons and vest."

"Come, Lucinda, are you ready?"

"Yes, in a minute."

"There, I said all you wanted was a little decision."

"Just so, a little decision," responded Mrs. Summerly, giving the desk a vigorous push.

"Everything gives way when it comes to a push," complacently remarked the gentleman, who was unaware of his wife's appropriation of the portmanteau.

"Dear me, I hope not in this instance," said the lady, in an undertone.

"Telescope, sir, and a box of cigars," announced Jane, entering with the articles mentioned.

"Cigars! bless me, I quite forgot them, and what should I have done without them." So saying he snatched one of the knives, and opened the box.

"And now for my breakfast," said Mrs. Summerly, sitting down quite exhausted at the table.

"Ah!" cried the gentleman, jumping up, "the old sort, and what an odor, to be sure; an actual bouquet—no cabbage leaf here. But where are they to go? Carpet bags full; O, there's her portmanteau open, just space for these and the telescope. Yes," he continued, crossing the room, and stowing them away, "and my railway library too, my shilling's worth of fun and horror."

"Why, Felix, what are you doing?" inquired Mrs. Summerly, turning round.

"Packing my cigars away."

"On top of my dresses?" And jumping up, she came to the rescue.

"Why, my love, they won't hurt anything."

"That box will destroy them."

"Then we won't have the box. There, fragrant shower," emptying the box into the trunk, and then throwing it away.

"Well, but cigars are not eau de cologne, and they may make people think that I smoke myself; they're a horrible habit, your only bad taste; your cigars, you know, are always provoking me."

"And yet, poor things, they're the mildest Havanas. But I say, see my telescope, bought it last night, and got the man to oil it so it will come out at a sling." Then suddenly throwing it open, Mrs. Summerly involuntarily started back, but the enthusiastic husband continued, "There's a fine fellow, carries as far as an eighty-four pounder."

"And looks something like one."

"No matter how great the distance, makes everything plain."

"Then I beg you'll use it when you look at the women."

"From the tailor, sir, if you please," said Jane, putting her head in at the door, "and from a shop in Cheapside."

"More parcels, Felix; why, where are they to go?"

"To Germany, I hope."

Mrs. Summerly went toward him, coffee-cup in hand.

"And there are our best treasures—I didn't forget them, though my time was so short; look here, 'Cinda, here—here's a handbook, my darling."

"A handbook!"

"A handbook to tell us all we're to see—roads, cities and pictures; information about everything, from the price of a cutlet to the style of a Raphael."

"Well, that's a treasure, certainly."

"And a pocket vocabulary in German and English, with questions on every conceivable subject. I've learnt already to say, 'How d'ye do?' and bring us some dinner; 'Brin gen dass mittags mahl,' bring in the beef."

"Yes, I see."

"Not hard a bit, it's so much like English. 'Wie befinden sie sich,' that's how d'ye do? or, how do we find you? We be finding, quite English. Don't know what 'sich' is, suppose it means such."

"Well, Felix, well."

"Then here's an auxiliary—a map of the Rhine that would make a stair carpet. There's a spread of knowledge," throwing it out, "with the river winding down it like a worm in a bottle."

"Why, with all these companions we might as well stay at home."

"And here's something more."

"Good gracions."

"My coat for the steamer. It may come on a regular blow, you know; then you go below, while I stop on deck to have a chat with the captain, and a friendly cigar—we pace the deck together, puffing away like a couple of funnels."

Here's a suit of armor to make a man weather-proof," he continued, inserting himself into a rubber hat and coat. "There, who is to be frightened in such rigging as this?"

"Why, who ever looks at you, to be sure? But come, we must finish breakfast."

"Yes, yes, to breakfast. The fly will be here at half-past."

"Yes, to a minute."

"And your father's going with us?"

"He is, to the docks."

"And some friends, you said, are coming in?"

"The Browns and the Simpsons, just to say good-by."

"Very kind of them—excellent people. They seem to be as pleased as if they were going too. O, Lucinda, 'Cinda, I don't think I could be happier if Woollet had popped off, and I was at the head of the office."

"And would that event please you?"

"Of course, love, officially. One's income and spirits are like gas and a balloon—as one enlarges t'other rises. But a trip of the Rhine," he continued, spreading himself upon two or three chairs, "the enjoyment of all others I've panted so long for—have talked and dreamed of, with its fine German wines and its German songs. Learned one last year:

'Be blessings on the Rhine,
The Rhine whereon the grapes are growing!'" roared Mr. Summerly, out of all time and tune.

"O, Felix," cried Mrs. Summerly.

"What's the matter? have I got a bad ear?"

"No, but you'll give me one."

"And then to go with you, love! Every year we've been somewhere during the two we've been married—first into Wales, then to Boulogne—but this is a treat above all to partake with you; to share the inspiration of its scenery, its climate; to drink in by your side, love—I'll take some more tea—to drink in by your side its poetical beauty."

Here Mrs. Summerly put a warm, buttered roll into his hand.

"You, whose affection has made my life such an Eden; whose sweetness, whose kindness—sugar, my darling—has turned a wild scape-grace into a being all quietness, mildness, and—"

"Milk?"

"Thank you, love, thank you. Yes, 'Cinda, yes, it's a proud recollection that our happiness has been a stream that has flowed on unruffled; all the world to each other, we'd nothing to desire, confiding as we have with the most perfect reliance."

"A letter, if you please, sir," said Jane, entering, "but I've had such an accident."

"An accident?"

"Yes, sir, in my hurry just now, I upset the inkstand, and running to the ham the letter fell into it!"

"What, into the frying pan?"

"No, sir, the ink," displaying the inundated epistle by a solitary corner that had escaped the flood.

"And now served up with appropriate gravity—a nice affair, certainly—international postage; a document from France, with our own kitchen stamp."

"From France, Felix?" exclaimed Mrs. Summerly, in surprise.

"Yes, but plague take it, the ink has run over both the post mark and name—nothing left but 'summerly, sincerely.'"

"And don't you know the hand?"

"Can't say I do."

"And you're not expecting a letter?"

"None from abroad. Your father expects one—he wrote to my friend, Hooker, who lives at Bourdeaux, to send him some claret, and has had no reply."

"Well, then, let me look. Why this writing is a woman's."

"Certainly, very much like it," responded Mr. Summerly, applying himself to the ham.

"But the postmark is—and yet (blotting it on the table) there's a B, and an O, and a LL—Boulogne. Why, Felix, the letter's for me!"

"For you, love?"

"For me, it comes from Jane Morrison. She's at Boulogne—we met her there last year."

"Jane Morrison?"

"Yes, my old friend and schoolmate, who's there with her brother."

"O, ah! with her brother," said Mr. Summerly, suddenly suspending his attack on the meal before him.

"Yes; well I'll read it after breakfast, or when I've done packing, for I've a world still to do, and—" Without finishing her speech Mrs. Summerly put the letter in her pocket.

"You won't read it now, then?"

"Why, I can guess what's in it; all sorts of nonsense about new comers and old friends—there now," clearing a corner of the table for the contents of her pockets, "I've finished breakfast, and now I'll finish the portmanteau." So saying, she returned to her valise, while Mr. Summerly remained at the table with his knife.

"Jane Morrison there with her brother," muttered the gentleman.

"Why, Felix," exclaimed Mrs. Summerly,

"you monster, you've not only put in your horrid cigars, but all these gloves, and this lot of books when I wasn't looking. O, I'm a pattern wife to indulge you this way."

"There, and with her brother," mused Mr. Summerly.

"Why, are you going to sit there all day?" inquired his wife, looking round in surprise at his continued silence.

"Why, I've not got through breakfast—anticipation of the sea air has given me an appetite, and this ham is so delicious that—I say, my love," he continued, with downcast eyes, shovelling the morsels at a dangerous rate, "you haven't put that letter aside because I'm here?"

"Because you're here!" repeated the lady in amazement.

"Yes, I believe I spoke sufficiently loud."

"And do you imagine I have any secrets?"

"Well, I can't say you have had."

"And you think I'm going to begin now?"

"Well, really I don't know, but—" A great clattering of knife and fork supplied the remainder of the speech.

"Why Felix," said Mrs. Summerly, going toward him, "what's entered your head?"

"Some ham, but this moment, and famous it is, too."

"Ha, ha, this is really too good."

"What, the meat, or the question?"

"Dear me, I've no time to laugh, but what on earth ails you?" And the lady resumed her occupation.

"It seems she has time enough to compliment," muttered Mr. Summerly.

"If you please, ma'am," announced Jane, "Mrs. Andrews has brought you what she promised."

"O, the mantle. The dear, kind creature made it to go abroad in herself this summer; but illness preventing, she offers it to me. Now, my dear, you shall look at it, and say if it's not a most charming invention."

"Humph, I hope it's the only one," was the muttered response.

"And she says, ma'am," continued Jane, "that you promised her the key of the garden while you was gone."

"To be sure. Here, I've got it in my pocket, but everything is so crammed in—letters, packages, and all sorts of articles—there, I must empty them all out. Yes, here it is, I'll carry it myself; but you needn't stop, Felix, you can pack away, and I'll come right back."

Mr. Summerly took up the letter which was now lying on the table, and turned it over.

"From Jane Morrison, eh? Well, I suppose it is so; but it's very odd that her brother writes exactly such a scrawl. That confounded captain—I fancy I can see his very face in this letter." Here he spitefully spiked it on his fork, and held it up. "Here's his wretched white look," turning the white side outward; "and here's his dirty black mustaches," surveying the inky reverse. "Of course it can't be from him—that's nonsense; and yet his impudence was so astonishing that I shouldn't wonder at most anything. I would really like to open it, and then, too, it's not strictly honorable, either, to break open a letter; but a wife's—isn't all that belongs to her mine? I've law on my side, but not honor—yet there's prudence, perhaps, requires it—let me think."

Mr. Summerly ruminated deeply for several moments, at the end of which time he exclaimed:

"Prudence beats honor all hollow! And that being the case, I'll—" Here he carefully began to break the seal, when Mrs. Summerly entering in the mantle, he hastily thrust the note behind him.

"Well, Felix, it's on, how does it look?"

"Look! Why—why—"

"Dear, what's the matter—anything awkward?"

"About one of us, certainly," thought Mr. Summerly.

"Well, I see you don't fancy it, though you won't say so."

"O, yes, I'm delighted; very becoming, I assure you."

"It's wonderfully comfortable, at any rate. Now to lock up—have you finished what you're about?"

"Well, no, not entirely."

"Still wasting your time. Everything's packed, I believe, now you've been wanting to open something."

"Cinda!"

"Yes, you have, now, I'm quite sure. But there's no time to stand still. These things must go back to my pocket—letters, keys, scissors—"

"I must get rid of this somewhere," thought Summerly, clutching the document nervously.

"Eh, why, where's Jane's letter? Have you seen it, Felix?"

"Seen what?" inquired the gentleman, endeavoring to pitch it into an open trunk unobserved.

"Jane Morrison's letter—do you know where I put it?"

"Why, how foolish to ask me such a question."

"I must have laid it down somewhere—and I thought on this table."

"Then of course you'll find it on the table."

"But you see it's not on the table; perhaps it's under it—help me to move it, Felix. Why don't you take both hands?" she asked, as he awkwardly commenced moving the table with one hand only.

"Because where's the need, if one's enough?"

At this crisis Jane entered with a parcel, and spied the letter which he was so carefully holding behind him.

"No," said Mrs. Summerly, looking down, "there's not a sign of it. O, Jane, have you found it, the letter that came this morning, and got dropped into the ink?"

"Yes, Jane," chimed in Mr. Summerly, "have you found it?"

"Why, isn't that it in your hand, sir?"

"My hand?"

"Yes, sir, which you're holding behind you."

"Behind you!" ejaculated Mrs. S.

"Bless me, so it is!" cried Mr. S., examining it with as much apparent wonder and curiosity as if it had dropped from the clouds into his hand without his knowledge.

"And so, Mr. Felix," said his wife, as Jane left the room, "you were hiding it, were you? And merely for a joke, when our time is so short—but I'll make up for it."

"Then you're not going to read it?" he inquired as she put it in her pocket again.

"To read it! why my dear, you're singularly interested—I begin to think you're in love with Jane, for you were very attentive at Boulogne you know, her shadow indeed."

"Because you were eternally snapped up by the captain, who had the honor of being an old acquaintance,—and who now, perhaps, writes to revive tender reminiscences."

"Do you think this letter comes from him?"

"Well, if I must confess —"

"Ah! now it's all clear—you are so absurd as to be jealous of that person again."

"Madam, I deny it! jealous of him, an effeminate puppy, who was my utter contempt—a disgrace to the army, where we want men, at least."

"And which in his case, sir, possesses a gentleman—he is an old acquaintance."

"And was to have been your husband. I can't say I think it's much of a compliment to be preferred to him."

"You're making me doubt if it has proved an advantage."

"Very likely—pity you didn't take him; but if you have no regard to your own feelings, I beg you'll respect mine. Jealous of him, indeed!"

"That is the only excuse for your rude conduct to the captain, which was remarked by everybody. O, if I had behaved so to a friend of yours, what a fury you'd have been in!"

"So you did act. Not a year ago, your conduct was infinitely more shameful to Miss Hooker, just because as an old friend of her father's, I went down to Streatham to dine one Sunday."

"Miss Hooker is a vulgar, illiterate being," cried Mrs. Summerly, with angry emphasis, "she hasn't one claim to the term of lady."

"She's a generous, amiable, fine girl, who could make any man happy."

"Then I'm sorry she didn't try to make you so."

"Perhaps I do too, madam."

"If she had, I would have given full acknowledgement of her talents."

"You praise them enough now, for you're dying of jealousy."

"Denial, in such a case, I should consider beneath me; and now, Mr. Summerly, you actually believe this letter was sent by a person whom I encourage in a secret attachment?"

"I regret to declare it," sighed the husband.

"And in consequence of your absurd whim, you expect me to open it?"

"I expect you to open it."

"Perhaps, then, you had better sit down, sir, as I must inform you that you're very likely to—wait!"

"Then you refuse?"

"I do. If you can insult me by such a suspicion, you shall have the additional disgrace of disproving it."

"O, excellent! as you prefer, madam; this is a capital way of disguising your own fears—a complete admittal that you're afraid to convince me; but it is unnecessary, my dear, as I can imagine the contents—would you like to hear them?"

"With all my heart!" cried Mrs. Summerly, flinging herself into a chair.

"He commences thus—'My idolized Lucinda!'"

"Mr. Summerly!" exclaimed the lady, with an assumption of outraged dignity.

"Shall I proceed?"

"Just as you please."

"My angel of angels—I learn that your husband has obtained his yearly vacation, and proposes a journey."

"Now how should he learn that, I'd like to have you inform me," cried the young wife, her eyes sparkling with triumph.

"Well, he imagines it—it's all the same thing. 'Where is your destination? Let me know immediately, that I may follow you instantly. Can you not persuade the good creature to visit Boulogne, as you did last year? My amiable sister would of course engage his attention, while"—

But Mrs. Summerly could listen no longer.

"And you've the audacity," she interrupted, "to say he would presume to write me such a letter?"

"I have, madam."

"And that I would receive it?"

"You state my belief."

"Then, sir," said Mrs. Summerly, rising, "you must feel I am unworthy to be your wife, and that it is our duty to part."

"Very well, we part."

"And this instant too—without a moment's delay."

"Without a moment's delay."

"How fortunate this discussion has occurred in season to save you the intended expense of my journey."

"Fortunate indeed! It saves money and character."

"The cab's come, sir," said Jane, opening the door.

"Send it away," ordered her mistress; noticing the girl's surprise, "I'm not going."

"But I am," said Mr. Summerly. "Tell it to stop." Then as Jane left the room—"Do you think I will lose a long wished for pleasure because you're not with me? No, madam, I shall go to the Rhine, if I have to go alone—you can stay behind! My credit is good enough to furnish you with all you want, and—"

"So you fancy I will remain moping all by myself, while you're sporting about like a butterfly! Not a bit of it, sir; if you go to Germany, sir, I go to Paris."

"Paris?"

"Yes, Paris. Aunt Melissa offered to take me not a week ago, and I'll send a note instantly to say I accept the invitation."

"And would you, madam," cried Mr. Summerly, choking with vexation, "with no better protector than an invalid old aunt, expose yourself to all the temptations of Paris?"

"Temptations, sir, are in the heart—not the eyes!"

"Would you risk your reputation, your priceless good name, by a rash step that the most thoughtless would disapprove? If you have no care for yourself, have you no consideration for me—for the title of my wife, madam?"

"Then you would have me prize what you throw away. But don't alarm yourself, sir; whatever provocation I may receive, don't fear I shall fail in self-respect. And now, as time flies, we'll separate our baggage, and you then can take your course—I, mine. You shall start to-day; I, to-morrow."

A vigorous assault upon the contents of the plethoric trunk in the corner now ensued.

"Of course, madam, of course; and as you justly observe, it will result in a decided saving. All I want now is my bag and hat case; just look them up, and call in the man. Here are a few articles belonging to you, madam," pitching them successively on to the floor, "your boots, and your hair brushes, and your trumpery parcels."

"Yes, sir, and a few of yours; your books, gloves, and your horrid old cigars! Say rather, dead cabbage leaves steeped in a tanpit," and, suiting the action to the word, she tossed the bundle, loose fragments and all across the room, Mr. S. intercepting them in their descent.

"Havanas! Havanas!" he shouted furiously, "ten dollars a pound! That's the last straw; after that would a worm lack spirit to turn! No—that has decided me, and now we separate." And by way of preparation he grasped his carpet-bag and hat-box, while the lady frantically clutched a hand-box and parasol.

"We separate, madam."

"Yes sir, we part."

"Wide as two continents."

"Distant as the poles."

"As Asia and Africa."

"With a Sahara between us."

"Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, ma'am, and all the Simpsons, if you please, sir," announced Jane, opening the door.

"Our neighbors," said Mr. Summerly; "very well, you'll see them, of course, as you're going to stay, and can inform them why you're deserted; but as I'm limited for time, I shall be off."

"Indeed, you shall not, sir. Jane, leave the room. Indeed, you shall not leave me to explain; you shall bear your share of that disgrace which belongs rather to you than to me. This step is of your own seeking, sir, and I demand that you explain all yourself; if you won't go to them, you must see my father at any rate. He will be here in a minute, and he will, of course, desire an explanation."

"Well, that's true enough!" thought Mr. S.

"And one that shall be satisfactory, also."

"I don't know as I care for that, after all, as she must then confess everything about that hateful letter," muttered Mr. S. "Well, madam, well, if I must publish this shameful affair to our friends, I must have my credentials, and must produce my proof to them and your father in the shape of that letter you hold."

"O, you think so?"

"Yes, unpleasant as it may be, you will perceive it must be given up."

"Very well; say no more, the letter's yours," and she handed him the note.

"That's not it."

"O, no, it isn't; I beg pardon," and she renewed her search amid the contents of her capacious pocket.

"Please be sure this time," said Mr. S. turning away, and holding out his hand.

"Why," muttered his wife, looking at the superscription of the right one which she took out, "now that I look at it carefully, I don't think it's at all like Jane's hand-writing."

"Ah, ha!" thought Mr. Summerly, noticing the delay, "I knew I should catch her. I was certain she would not give it up."

"And here's a B-o-u-r-d—why, this isn't from Boulogne at all, it's from Bourdeaux."

"Bourdeaux!"

"Yes, and I don't know a soul there—it's not my letter, after all! So just take it, and welcome."

Mr. Summerly picked it up as she indignantly flung it on the floor, and proceeded to examine it closely.

"And now, sir," cried the lady, bitterly, "I congratulate you on your valuable proof, without which you can enlighten our neighbors immediately, though without your credentials—which turn out to be merely a billet from Bourdeaux. Why—Bourdeaux! Isn't that where the Hookers live?"

"I—I think so."

"And his charming, amiable daughter, Miss Betsey? who shows her vaunted good taste and propriety in writing to an old lover, married two years ago."

"Heaven forbid!" mentally ejaculated Mr. S. "But the girl always was terribly sentimental—and may be it is from her."

"This pattern of all the virtues!" continued Mrs. Summerly, alluding to the afore-mentioned young person, "this matrimonial prize! Perhaps, sir, you'll read the letter?"

"By no means."

"I should suppose you would like to illustrate the beauty of confidence—confidence, the main-spring of domestic happiness!"

"Of all the fairy coverings that ever adorned a woman's feet"—began the discomfited husband, picking up his wife's boots with a very flushed and crestfallen countenance—

"Don't talk about my feet, sir!" was the angry retort—"have the goodness to look me straight in the face!"

"And such tiny treasures as these to be lying in the dust," continued Mr. S., carefully brushing the articles.

"Which you are trying to throw in my eyes. Do you intend to read it, sir?"

"Now, my darling, what is the use of talking any more about this absurd affair?"

"Absurd, sir! A letter from Miss Hooker!"

"Who's a silly girl—a positive fool!"

"Then you ought to be ashamed of having called out her affections."

"I deny that I did so. I don't care a straw for her."

"You know very well that you would have married her but for a quarrel, which fact you were so mean as to keep a secret from me."

"Silence, madam, silence!" exclaimed Mr. Summerly, getting angry again.

"But it's now very evident that you are as much attached as ever, and this tour up the Rhine was only a ruse to get to France, and visit Bourdeaux."

"Well, well," he cried, "I can't stand this! I would rather break open the government mails!" And seizing the letter he was about to unseal it, when Mrs. Summerly's father entered the room.

"Well, 'Cinda! Well, Felix!"

"O, here's my father!" exclaimed the lady.

"In very good time, then."

"To hear the contents."

"No, to read them! My dear sir, here is a letter I wish you would read, and which your daughter insists is intended for me."

"And my husband says is intended for me! Therefore have the kindness to be the judge."

The old gentleman quietly opened the cause of all this domestic disturbance, and an enclosure fell out. At sight of this, he calmly said—"It happens to be for neither of you!"

"What!" cried both in one breath.

"Yes, it is for me! About that claret I ordered. Hooker is ill—has lost my address—so Mrs. H. has sent his answer under cover to you."

As he turned away to read the letter, the young couple stood looking at each other in silent confusion.

"Why, Felix!" said Mrs. Summerly, at length.

"'Cinda!" was the mortified response.

"Is it possible that—"

"All this hurricane has actually risen—"

"From nothing at all!"

"Come, my children," said the old gentleman, advancing from the window, "you have no spare time; the boat starts at eleven, and it's nearly that now."

"So it is," said Mr. Summerly, consulting his watch in surprise.

"Very well then, get on your things, and I'll see to the trunks being put on to the carriage. Here, Jane, call the hack driver."

Under his superintendence the driver and Jane seized the trunks, band-boxes, bags, bundles and parcels, running to and fro from the room to the street, until the apartment was cleared.

"These cunning little boots—I must find a place for them," said Mr. Summerly, stowing them into his coat pocket.

"And these delicious cigars—there's plenty of space in my reticule!" responded Mrs. Summerly.

"Very well, 'Cinda dear, come along now. But before we drop this subject, and forever, just let me say that as people often fall out about the most ridiculous things in the world—"

"Yes indeed, the merest trifles in life—"

"At the very time when they ought to be happiest—"

"If they would take time for inquiry and reflection—"

"And use common sense—"

"They would save themselves great annoyance, and what is equally ever desirable, the comments of amused spectators and officious acquaintances."

"Say no more, Felix, we have learnt a lesson that shall last us all our lives."

"We have indeed," replied her husband, kissing her bright face; "and now we must hurry, indeed."

So saying, he tucked her under his arm, and they jumped into the hack, radiant with anticipations of future happiness, and were whirled away to the landing amid the envious congratulations of all their neighbors, who believed there was never such a happy couple before, and never would be again.

SEA BATHING.

A distinguished medical man thus speaks of the advantages to be derived from it:—"Sea bathing, on account of its stimulative and penetrating power, may be placed at the head of those means that regard the care of the skin, and which certainly supplies one of the first wants of the rising generation, by opening the pores, and thereby invigorating the whole nervous system. Besides its great healing power in cases of disease, it may be employed by those who are perfectly well, as the means most agreeable to nature for strengthening and preserving health. In this respect, it may be compared to bodily exercise, which can remove diseases otherwise incurable, and may be used by those in health in order to preserve themselves in that state."

Be courteous to every man, but intimately acquainted only with good men; so mayest thou shun the hatred of the one, and cordially enjoy the other.

SABBATH BELLS.

BY EDWIN MONTAGUE.

Return once more ye days!
In which the fluttering heart
Hath yielded to those sacred peals
That through the Sabbath twilight start—
That to the soul a spell impart
Which wins to praise.

Sweet evening melodies!
Recalling many a tender thought
Of chastened joys in boyhood-time;
Of friendships gained, affections sought—
Now vanished, yet thy softened chime
Still gently swells, as low—sublime,
As in those brighter days.

Why does my soul resist?
Thy echoes richly blend in praise,
Far floating on the summer breeze;
Why should my heart brood o'er the days
Whose darkness dims such joys as these,
Withdrawn from heaven's redeeming rays?
To thee I'll list.

THE BAMBOO HARMONICON.

The bamboo harmonicon, or staccato, is a curious example of the production of melody by simple and unexpected means. Its use, though unknown in India, extends throughout the Eastern Archipelago; and something similar is possessed, I believe, by the negro slaves in Brazil. Eighteen to twenty-four flat slips of bamboo, about an inch and a half broad, and of graduated length, are strung upon a double string, and suspended over the mouth of a trough-like sounding-box. The roundish outside of the bamboo is uppermost, and whilst the extremities of the slips are left to their original thickness, the middle part to each is thinned and hollowed out below. The tuning is accomplished partly by the regulation of this thinning of the middle part. The scale so formed is played with one or two drumsticks, and the instrument is one of very mellow and pleasing tone. Though the materials are of no value, a good, old harmonicon is prized by the owner like a good old Cremona, and he can rarely be induced to part with it. There was one example, at the capital, of a similar instrument formed of slips of iron or steel. It was said to have been made by the august hands of King Tharawadee himself, who, like Louis Seize, was abler as a smith, than as a king. The effect was not unpleasant, and strongly resembled that of a large Geneva musical-box, but it was far inferior in sweetness to the bamboo instrument.—Athenæum.

NOBILITY.

What is noble? That which places
Truth in its enfranchised will!
Leaving steps—like angel traces—
That mankind may follow still!

Even though scorn's malignant glances
Prove him poorest of his clan,
He's the noble—who advances
Freedom and the cause of man!

JEANIE'LL BE THY BRIDE.

BY LENA LYLE.

They bid me cease to love thee,
To tear thee from my heart;
To banish every lingering thought,
From thee forever part;
They tell me thou art faithless,—
But let what will betide,
I have given thee my promise,
And Jeanie 'll be thy bride.

They bid me cease to love thee!
To scorn thee and to hate;
They say thou wilt forsake me,
To find a fairer mate.
But ah, thy parting whispers
Around me ever glide,
And angel memory murmurs,
"Jeanie 'll be my bride."

I'll cling to thee forever,
With hope, and joy, and pride;
Thy home shall be a heaven,
And Jeanie 'll be thy bride.
I know those noble features
Decelt could never hide,
And though the wide world scorn me,
Jeanie will be thy bride.

My heart and hand I give thee,
Thy lot I choose for mine;
Till God is pleased to part us,
I am forever thine.
I bring not wealth or beauty,
Nor gold and jewels fine;
But I bring one priceless treasure,
Jeanie's heart is thine!

SENATOR WILLISTON.

BY MRS. MARY A. DENISON.

YES, I wanted to try it—and I did try it to my heart's content.

"You know there's no real need of your going," said my mother. She sat in her favorite seat by the door, crimping her cap borders as fast as Mag ironed them.

"I don't know about that," was my dubious reply. "Sid, out there pitching quoits, wants a new suit of clothes and a new pair of shoes. Where are they coming from, I should like to know?"

"Why, perhaps his uncle—"

"You dear, good, easy mother," I said, kneeling down at her feet and smiling in her face, "hain't you learned not to place any dependence on rich uncles, yet? Why, mother, if Uncle Sam sent a suit of clothes to our Sid, I'd—I'd—well, I don't know but I would tear them into inch bits."

"No, you wouldn't," said my mild mother.

"Yes, she would, ma," said matter-of-fact Jessie, whose arms were half way up in dough. "You ought to have seen her when Aunt Sue asked her what she came there in a calico dress for. I didn't know but the house would catch fire from her eyes. How Aunt Sue did look! ha! ha! when Liz said, 'if you don't like my gingham dresses, madam, just please to look the other way.' O, it was fun!"

I half laughed, half cried at the recollection, for my pride was terribly wounded.

"About this school," said my mother, with a sigh, "I wonder if it's a rough one?"

"It will make no difference with me," was my reply; "I want some excitement—it's dull here."

"She wants to go and get a rich husband," said Jessie.

"Nonsense, Jessie—hold your tongue—what do I care for a husband, rich or poor?"

"A good deal, I guess, from what I heard you say last night to Nell," she replied.

I was almost angry, and told her again to hold her tongue—but the torment went on—she always would.

"Nelly was saying how much she wished to learn to play and sing; and, says my lady here, 'never mind, Nelly, I'll go to Langford, and pick up a rich husband, and then you shall come and live with me, and learn everything you want to.'"

"Jessie—you shouldn't," said my mother, shaking her head, while my cheeks were crimson.

I had said it, but it was only in fun—and I forgot that Jessie was such an inveterate tell-tale. I hurried to my room to write my acceptance of the Langford Academy, and in a week I was in all the glory of packing. Poor me!—I had eked out my wardrobe by turning this and adding to that, for we were poor. My mother had insisted upon my accepting a black silk skirt that she had worn for six years. It was still respectable. Nearly all the linen was patched, and all the woolen darned. I had a slender outfit, to be sure, but what of that?

"My face to me a fortune is," sang I, and it was in no spirit of vanity that I assured myself that my figure would look better in a meagre dress than many I had seen robed in padded silk and hooped satin.

The leave-taking was very sad. Even Sid stopped his play and rubbed his eyes with his knuckles till the former were all plastered over with quoit-mud. Amidst his sobs I heard the words "candy" and "when you come back." My mother was very pale—Nelly sobbed passionately, and even Jessie's lip quivered as I kissed her good-by.

"Good-by," I said reverently to myself, as I passed the little grave-yard where a certain white stone bore my father's name, "aged forty-seven." "Farewell, sacred ashes—when you were animated by the gentlest of souls, you taught me the lesson of sturdy independence, and now I'm going to practise it."

At the depot I met our minister. He was a lovely looking old man, with hair bleached to a silvery whiteness. He came and gave me his blessing, saying some words that made me feel very childish in spite of my bravery, and sent the quick tear-drops to my eyes. But I got over that, and as I am gifted by nature with a cheerful disposition, I soon forgot the sorrow that had set out with me, and began to muse on the incidents of the journey occurring all around me. Not far from me sat a tall man, a hearty, pleasant featured gentleman, whose quiet manner would scarcely have attracted my notice, but whom people seemed to make so much fuss over, offering him attentions, and whispering apparently about him and his doings, that I could not avoid often glancing that way. He was not handsome, but extremely genial looking, with eyes of remarkable depth of expression, and lips that worked with every passing emotion. Around his hat a broad band of black crape told to me a tale of sorrow, and my imagination, always active, was soon busy portraying to itself the person and the precious privileges he might have lost.

The train stopped at a crowded station. I was looking listlessly out, when suddenly up went hat after hat, and the people crowded about some one who stood on the platform. It was no other than my tall and distinguished looking gentleman. Surely he must be somebody, I thought. When he entered the car again, I had a full view of his face, as he held up his hat in one hand, wiping a brow of magnificent proportions with the other. A lady dressed in great style was walking closely behind him, talking with unusual volubility, considering the place, and it seemed to me that she was anxious to call attention to the fact that she was well acquainted with the great man, if great man he was. He seemed looking here and there, and finally he spied me sitting alone, my eyes fixed intently upon him and his movements.

"Is this seat occupied, madam?"

I started, and he smiled, and biting my lip with vexation that I should have been in such a drowsy, dreamy state, I answered that it was not.

"Mrs. Van Lester, shall I seat you here?" he asked, turning with a graceful movement; "this lady says the place is unoccupied."

So Mrs. Van Lester, all smiles and bows towards me, and thinking possibly that the great man, if he was great—knew me, sat down with much affability, drawing her silken flounces from contact with the floor. The seeming hero of the hour left the cars, and appeared to be carried off bodily by admiring crowds. I turned my attention towards my travelling companion, who appeared to have a hard time of it getting over the consequent flurry of having been seen with a distinguished stranger. Her countenance spoke peace with herself and all the world—all her world.

"A very pleasant, courteous gentleman," she said, after running her keen eyes up and down my face.

"He seems so," was my reply.

"O, you don't know him!" she exclaimed, drawing a long breath.

"I have not that honor," I returned quietly.

"It is an honor—it really is an honor," she said, keeping her fussy hands in motion, and shaking the bugles in her bonnet. "That is Hon. Senator Williston, from —. He is on his way to Langford, where he has the most splendid country seat you ever saw. I suppose he speaks here to-night. I declare, I quite forgot to ask him. Our family and his are on the most delightfully intimate terms—indeed, his son Hal—a fine young man, visits us very constantly, so often that people begin to ask my daughter Emily quite significant questions. But, of course, Emily is but a child."

I sat quite still, an amused listener and observer. It seemed so odd to hear a stranger dive at once into family affairs, and that in a voice of such power, that but for the incessant "pat, pat, pat" of the cars, everybody could have heard.

"I see that he is in mourning," I observed.

"Yes—for his wife."

I was mentally exclaiming "poor man!" when she cut my condolence short, by saying:

"It was a very unhappy match indeed. It seems she loved him very much, but he didn't care about her as a man should who takes a wife. It happened in this way. Miss H. was a beautiful girl. She was thrown into his society, he was kind and attentive, as you might see it was natural for him to be—she fell deeply in love; her health, even her mind was threatened. The case was represented to him; he felt deeply under obligation, and finally married her. But it was dreadful, dreadful, I assure you! Years and years she has been always on the verge of insanity. He has been a kind husband, though not of course, a happy man. Every thing was done for her that could be done, but she lost all her beauty, all her health, and died about eighteen months ago. Though he is perfectly polite, he doesn't seem to care about addressing unmarried ladies at all, but confines his attentions exclusively to the married friends of his acquaintance."

"I should think it would create some jealousy," was my thoughtless reply.

"O, you don't know him!" said Mrs. Van Lester, "or you wouldn't say that; he is the soul of honor."

My cheeks were already burning for my foolish speech, but I took refuge under the thought that I was a stranger.

"Do you go to Langford?" The question startled me; there had been a long silence, during which my thoughts had travelled back towards home. I was just deep in a vision of Jessie with her hands in the dough—Sid, eating bread and butter—mother darning or knitting with a sad face, and Nelly singing some mournful melody connected with thoughts of absence. Quite as a matter of course, I replied:

"Yes, madam—I am going there to teach school."

My travelling friend raised her eyebrows, took another deliberate survey of my cheap muslin dress, scanned my face again, looked dissatisfied, and—did not speak to me again during the remainder of the journey.

EPISTOLARY.

IN MY SCHOOL-ROOM.

"To NELLY,—Yes, I'm fairly in for it, Nell—an established country schoolmarm. I'm snatching a few moments while the children are at recess to tell you something about it. My youngest scholar is two years and a half old,—a boy with a big head always covered with blue bruises. I have to appoint a special monitor to stand over him and keep him from tumbling, for he sleeps about all the time. Prepare to laugh. My oldest scholar is a green youth of twenty-two. When his eyes are not on his book, they are fixed upon me, and I am puzzled to know which are opened widest, his eyes or his mouth. He is more than five feet high, and sits a dozen inches or so from the floor. I am obliged to exercise all my philosophy to keep from laughing whenever I glance that way. But I shall get accustomed to it. There are some rose-buds here, beautiful with color and fragrance, and considerable dog-weed in the shape of gawky, ill-mannered youth—but I shall strive to be impartial. My boarding-house is a pleasant one—my landlady in every sense of the word a lady, pretty, delicate, agreeable, and inconsolable on account of her husband, now dead five years. A lawyer, who once knew father boards here, a contented old bachelor of forty. He says he is determined to make my stay pleasant, and has already introduced me to several people of note, among them my queer travelling companion. I told you about Mrs. Van Lester, who turns out to be the wife of a very rich merchant tailor. I don't like her "pretty well," as one of my little rose-buds says, but she tries to make herself agreeable. I have not yet met with the great man, Williston the honorable, but have seen his son, Hal Williston, who was pleased to give me an admiring stare, and has since taken the trouble to drag his delicate frame by the school-house at least once a day, managing in some way to get a glance at the interior of the school-room.

"I have the advantage of being benefited by the tasteful plans of my predecessor. It seems they gave her a mean building, black with age, inconvenient, hot in summer, cold in winter, in spite of the forest wood piled up hereabouts. So she, being one of the best sort of strong-minded women, battled for her rights until she had this handsome little edifice built in the midst of shady trees, and planted about with vines and rose bushes. She had been installed in the very desk where I am now sitting, just six months, when she foolishly gave up her independence and married the minister. So you see there is a possibility of making good matches here. Nelly, do you sing yet? I hope so. Keep our poor little piano in tune with the money that accompanies this, and practise as constantly as though I were there to oversee you. Tell mother the lace is for her; make her a tasteful cap. The sixpence put into Sid's hands, and do for once let him have his fill of candy. Jessie and you accept my love till I have something—I won't say better, but—in addition to send you.

"Very truly yours,

"LIZZIE WENTWORTH."

NARRATIVE.

The day had been neither hot nor uncomfortable. The new teacher, as she closed the gate leading from the school-yard into the road, paused a moment to catch the still beauty of the scene, to inhale the rare perfume of the sweet brier. Three softly crowned hills were reddening to the west with the rays of the setting sun. Between them intervened a tiny valley—the ground swelled softly to a gentle ascent—pretty dwellings with gardens filled with varied colors, and fields rich with summer grain, stood at pleasant distances apart. Lizzie Wentworth, wearied as she was, felt a freshening sense of delight as her glance fell yearningly eastward in the direction of her home. The sky was flooded with gold and purple—the shadows were creeping along with lengthened tread—the crickets were beginning their soothing song, and all sights and sounds contributed balm to the tired frame and the sad spirit. Lizzie had lingered much beyond her time in the pretty school-house that afternoon, lingered till the little girls who always claimed the privilege of a walk home with teacher, had strolled onward, gradually giving her up. She had been sitting with bowed head, thinking—thinking dejectedly over an open letter she had received from home. They had all been sick, one or two of them dangerously. How cruel she thought it of them not to tell her. If any had died and she had not been there, what bitterness of spirit would have been her portion. They were, however, all better. But the bills were frightful—they had very hard work to get along, and her quarter's salary would not be due for a month. So, to her, before she left her desk, the world had seemed very dark, and trouble threatening on all sides, but the calm beauty of nature led her thoughts up to God. As she walked slowly onward, she saw two persons approaching; they seemed in earnest conversation together. One of them was the tall, commanding figure of the senator, who had but recently returned; the other was the young clergyman whom she knew very well. They paused as they met, and then and there with heightened color, was presented to the Honorable Mr. Williston. With heightened color, I say, because she had already suffered from the attentions of his son, a handsome and wild young man with plenty of undisciplined good in him, and perhaps as much undisciplined evil. He had taken it into his brain, which was neither vain nor empty, but rash and impetuous, to admire her very much, thereby causing some scandal and more flutter among the marriageable young ladies in Langford—in particular Emma Van Lester, of whose house the young man had become quite an inmate before her advent. Lizzie did not really know what an extraordinary face she possessed—how winning, how full of intelligence, the soul's best beauty, it was! As eye answered eye in her mirror, she saw only the quiet reflection of a face—she did not see it when it smiled, spoke—sparkled with sudden delight, saddened with sympathetic feeling. She had not long passed the senator before she came in sight of his sumptuous house. How white and castle-like it was, standing upon an elevation overlooking all the most striking points of that region. How every pane turned with a hectic crimson, as the sun touched it with his paling fire. What noble pillars in front! What sumptuous hangings at the broad windows! "He has more than heart can wish," sighed Lizzie, "while at home they have come to their last loaf. Sick, and in a strange place—what can I do for them?"

She saw clearly that she must ask for an advance, and though her heart failed her, she set resolutely about it, succeeded, and sent home the fruits of her hard labor.

EPISTOLARY.

IN OUR OWN LITTLE ROOM.

"DEAR LIZZIE,—We were so glad when the money came! You should have seen us. Mother laughed and cried (she is not quite well yet), for the flour barrel was scraped yesterday till there was actually splinters in the bread. Now we have paid up our few little debts—they made mama sick—bought shoes and a cap for Sid, and improved ourselves generally. We shall do I guess till you send again. Meanwhile we are all at work trying to raise funds. Jessie has taken some sewing privately. I have one scholar, (and take my pay in dry goods—O, dear me!—we have all got new calicoes) and mama, well, she helps with the work when she's well. Lizzie, what do you think? I've had an offer! But—not an offer of marriage. A gentleman is spending the summer here who is said to be the great singer in an opera troupe. He is very handsome, coal black eyes and beautiful features. He heard me singing all by myself one night, and got an introduction (as he was pleased to say) on the strength of my beautiful voice. He really does praise it so highly, using all manner of scientific terms—and he is so gentlemanly. Well, he wants to teach me so that I may sing in public, perhaps in opera. I almost know what you will say—but I am very anxious. And then, he is so gentlemanly—but I believe I told you that before. Mother is pleased with him, only Jessie dislikes him. I don't see the reason, but she says she cannot bear him. Your letters are very precious. I wish you wouldn't speak so slightly of that senator's son. Why can't you like him, marry him, and let me come and live with you? Or else—we've been laughing at this—you marry the father, and save the son for me! There! disliking to correspond as I do, I've written a pretty long letter. Jessie, for a wonder, is not making bread, or darning stockings, or doing any work. What do you think? She is sitting at the piano, making all sorts of noises. I am going to a party to-night; hardly well enough, but I must have some fun. The singer will be there I expect. Mr. (it's a funny name) Lebroughth—pronounced Lebro. Why couldn't they spell it so, and done with it? Mama is just coming in with the table-cloth in her hand, so I must close. You would think us all rather pale for us—. Most truly yours,

"NELLY WENTWORTH."

NARRATIVE.

This letter found Lizzie preparing for a party, also. It was in September. The weather was delightful, though somewhat cool. Lizzie was not quite happy now, and the little missive did not tend to make her any more comfortable. It was the second time the family had been in trouble—the second time that she had been obliged to ask for an advance, and she was anxious and worried. This constant drain upon her little means, though it was cheerfully submitted to, yet compelled her to dress almost meanly, for she had turned, and trimmed, and managed the old dresses till she had been obliged to get a new one, and her purse was entirely empty. To-night she looked very sweet in her fresh, new silk, and with the one white, hot-house rose in her hair, as she sat now smiling, now thoughtful, twice reading her sister's letter.

"It won't do!" she exclaimed with energy. "O, who will warn her? She, so beautiful—with such a glorious gift—thoughtless, clinging, sensitive—no father's hand to guide; and mother, that gentlest of mothers, but taking little care—thinking little of such things—and this handsome foreigner—perhaps unprincipled—it won't do. I must say a decided no;—get her here—do anything to draw her from his influence. O, if my father had but lived!" She bowed her head upon her hands for a moment, and then strove for self-command.

It was a brilliant gathering. Miss Wentworth was decidedly a favorite. Would Miss Wentworth play? Would Miss Wentworth sing? Did not Miss Wentworth look beautifully?—to which none but Emma Van Lester answered a spiteful "no. What did she want to intrude herself upon good society for? She was only a school teacher—no money, no talents, no particular beauty that she saw. And as to that peculiar lighting up of the face that everybody spoke of—well, she guessed she had a temper."

To-night, however, Lizzie Wentworth, usually the life of the circle, was sad; her smiles were forced, her eyes heavy.

"It strikes me the face is somewhat familiar," said the Honorable Mr. Williston, to a friend. "O, I remember now—I was introduced to her some little time since. The school teacher, is she not?"

The senator looked at his son as he said this. He marked how eagerly the strained eye followed her every movement; he saw the flush come and go, the haughty lip tremble.

"You are acquainted with her," he ventured to remark.

"Yes, sir—to my sorrow," answered his son, his lip trembling worse yet.

The senator drew him aside, and heard in almost fierce words that he loved her, and that his snit had been rejected.

"And now, sir," he said, with a short, wild laugh, "the coast is clear; she may look with more favor upon the father than the son."

Mr. Williston frowned. The speech displeased him, and he turned proudly away. Hal was naturally noble and generous; he laid his hand on his father's arm, and said:

"Forgive me, sir; I forgot myself."

And yet, indignant as Senator Williston had been at the moment, those words followed—haunted him. "She may look with more favor upon the father." He turned to where she stood. At that moment, strangely enough, no one was monopolizing her attention. She stood, perhaps listening to a simple song—perhaps not, for her dark eyes were fixed upon vacancy; there was a pensiveness about her that appealed irresistibly to his heart—the lips looked almost grieved. There may have been magnetism in that glance; certain it is that as she lifted her eyes, they fell full upon his, and then, after that peculiar fascination of sight, which all have experienced on some occasion, a real color mounted to her face.

"She is very much annoyed to see me watch her so steadily—it is vexatious!" exclaimed the senator to himself, turning away.

EPISTOLARY.

"DEAR NELLY,—Your letter came day before yesterday, and made me both glad and sorry, as my money made mama. In the first place, dear sister—NO! You know what I mean—the learning to be a public singer. Not if I can help it, dearest. I do not say by this, that the position is not respectable and honorable—almost always remunerative—but you are not by nature fitted for such a place. You are too sensitive—if I must say it—too beautiful. You must be shrouded in some sweet home, away from the public gaze. Again, be careful, be very careful whom you encourage. You are inexperienced—yet very young, and not skilled in the worldly judgment both men and women need. I know nothing about this German singer, but I ask you for my sake to be very careful. I am not afraid that you will commit any indiscretion, but how do we really know that it may not be disgraceful even to be acquainted with this man? Something tells me that you had better not receive his attentions. Jessie, with her common-sense notions, is almost always right. Listen to those who love you better than any one else can, little sister. I hear that the senator's son is about starting for Europe. There are, of course, various rumors, and I have gained the complete fill-will of Emily and Mrs. Van Lester. I am sorry, but how can I help it? I see very little of Mr. Williston; he is busied with public affairs. Very soon I will try to send you money. Keep up a good heart; maybe I shall have money enough to help you all yet. I fervently hope so. I am trying now for a vacancy in an academy forty miles off. I suppose I must see Mr. Williston about it, as I am referred to him. Under the circumstances, I feel rather delicate about calling on him, but the only way is to put an unconcerned face upon the matter—mask your heart and go ahead. Give my love to mama, Biddy, and all. Very affectionately, your sister, "LIZZIE WENTWORTH."

NARRATIVE.

A little room, in a little house—the house painted red—a little garden in front, a low doorway bordered with vines. In the little room Jessie, Nelly and Mrs. Wentworth sat, the two former reading over Lizzie's letter, now a week old, the latter industriously darning.

"What will Lizzie say when she knows that Mr. Lebro should have come courting our Nelly, and it turns out that he's got a wife?" cried Jessie, closing the letter.

"She'll say that he was a bad man," exclaimed Nelly, indignantly, "and I have nothing to blame myself for. I rejected him, didn't I?"

"Yes, to be sure, and it's well you did. There's five—and the biscuit to make." And up sprang Jessie after the bread-pan. Nelly meanwhile watched a coming carriage.

"I almost knew—something told me—yes, it is, it is she!" screamed Nelly, wildly, springing out to the little gate.

Jessie followed, her hands dropping flour. Lizzie, with such a glowing face was giving directions; then there was a kissing all round, and by-and-by they were snugly seated together, in their quiet sitting-room.

"Have you got the academy?" asked Nelly, untieing the strings of Lizzie's bonnet.

"No; but stoop down here a moment."

"O, Lizzie's going to be married! Mother!

Jessie! She says so—going to be married! O, Lizzie, who to?"

Lizzie's cheeks were scarlet and her eyes full of tears, but she looked so happy, as she said:

"Stoop down again, Nelly."

"O, mother, to Senator Williston! Why, I can't believe it! How came it so?"

It came so very naturally. Lizzie went to ask a favor of Senator Williston, and he, with a great deal of politeness and earnest looking towards her, said he would willingly—nay, with pleasure, make application. He would call at her house, if the answer was favorable. So, he called where Lizzie boarded, and the sweet, young girl was alone. Her trembling lips and grateful smile as she thanked him, gave him great boldness. He knew he loved her—he knew how worthy and how great she was; he wanted just such a wife, and he proposed. Lizzie had always admired him more than any man she ever saw—it doesn't take long sometimes for admiration to change to love. In her case, it was quick work, and she felt glad, proud and happy, as the kiss of betrothal pressed her brow.

"I told you she was going to get a rich husband," said Jessie, going back complacently to her dough.

"But I didn't try for it," said Lizzie, laughing. "My conscience is clear on that score. I never dreamed of it till he spoke—but, O, you will say he is noble when he comes next week; you will all love him. He knows you all, he says, I have talked so much about you—and our home shall be yours. He declares he'll make Sid a governor. Where is he?"

A pair of arms were thrown about her neck, and two lips wet with candy left an impress on her face. Sidney was a handsome rogue, and looked all of the governor.

"I told her she might have the father—who knows but I shall have the son sometime!" said Nelly, combing her curls out that night.

"I prophesy you will," rejoined Jessie.

The prophecy is fulfilled—for Lizzie is to-day called grandmother by her own sister's dear little boy; one year old.

REPENTANCE AND REMORSE.

Bad as the results have been in the world of making light of sin, those of brooding over it have been worse. Remorse has done more harm than hardihood. It is remorse which so remembers bygone faults as to paralyze the energies for doing Christ's work; for when you break a Christian's spirit, it is all over with progress. O, we want everything that is hopeful and encouraging for our work, for God knows it is not an easy one.

THE TELEGRAPH FLAG.

BY RICHARD WRIGHT.

There's a flag richly studded with brilliant stars beaming,
 Prized as life by the States of America's soil;
 There's a flag, the red cross, in its majesty streaming,
 The proud, noble ensign of Albion's isle;
 Both glorious and splendid, both hailed with devotion
 By two nations—the only FREE two in the world;
 But greater than these, on the bosom of ocean,
 The Telegraphic Flag at the mast-head unfurled.
 Success to the Telegraph Flag! may it grace
 In unparalleled beauty each terminus place.

Mighty project! to bind in still closer connexion
 The sands long united by commerce and trade;
 And guided by wisdom's unerring direction,
 An union of interest with fellowship made.
 Now, the CABLE, from one shore to the other extending,
 Forming mail-route direct, with a lightning power—
 The dispatch, submarine, some two thousand miles send—
 And receiving reply to the same, in the hour! [ing,
 Success to the Telegraph Flag! may it grace
 In unparalleled beauty, each terminus place.

Hail! the Telegraph Flag! stars and crosses combining;
 God speed it in full, perfect triumph to wave;
 Green and bright civic wreaths round each brow be entwining

Of the staunch, toiling men, scientific and brave.
 Be America—England, firm, true friends for ever,
 Daily greeting each other across the great sea;
 Mutual service, their rivalry's fervent endeavor—
 The stars and cross, quartered, the flag of the free!
 Success to the Telegraph Flag! may it grace
 In unparalleled beauty, each terminus place.

LINDSAY HOUSE.

BY H. W. BENNETT.

THE princely mansion of the Lindsays exhibited a picture of quietude and repose, on one of the September mornings of 1833, that corresponded but little to its usual character of noisy cheerfulness. The reason was apparent in the fact that nearly the whole family had gone out hunting, taking with them the guests who were then staying there, with a single exception. Although the grounds at Lindsay House were beautiful, and laid out in the very perfection of English gardening, the house itself was an object of far more interest, from its antique style, its splendid paintings, and the rich and rare fragments of a former age, that had been so carefully preserved by the successive owners of the mansion.

To one of the guests, there was an object of still greater interest, in the person of Mary Lindsay, the youngest and most beautiful of the fair bevy of maidens, who made the glory of Lindsay House, and the joy and hope of its owner, as well as his pride. If Margaret and Isabella were more stately and dignified, and the charms of Grace and Marion took the heart more by storm, with their buoyant spirits and fearless participation of outdoor sports, it was Mary who stole upon the senses, as comes a sweet south wind, laden with fragrance and bringing a soft and gentle influence, mild, yet refreshing.

On this morning, Mary had unaccountably refused to join in the sport in which she most delighted. In vain had her father pressed her to accompany him. She gently but decidedly refused to go.

"I fancy the early departure of young Harry Cavanagh has something to do with it, papa," exclaimed saucy Grace, "as he has been very attentive in this quarter."

Mary's soft eyes entreated her sister's forbearance; but the gay girl went on, in spite of the lowering cloud on the brow of Mr. Lindsay.

"It is really shameful, papa, and I think you ought to stop it. Here are Marion and myself arrived at the venerable ages of eighteen and nineteen, to say nothing of our elders here, Margaret and Belle, and none of us, I believe, have ever had an offer; at least, there is no tradition to that effect, that is at all entitled to notice! And then to think that Mary—the baby, mother still calls her—should be the first to experience that distinction—really, I am so affected that I cannot go on."

"What is all this nonsense about, Grace?" asked the father, sternly. "Do not tell me that the son of Edmund Cavanagh has dared address one of my daughters! Speak, Mary, are these idle words in your sister, or have you been so foolish as to think of this young Cavanagh, whom Leeds brought so intrusively to my house, and who, I am happy to see, has departed?"

Mary sat perfectly still—her eyes fixed upon her father's face, where she now beheld anger towards herself for the first time. Grace, affrighted by the effect of her light and careless words, followed her sisters in their pretty hunting dresses of Lincoln green to the court yard, aware that any attempt to make peace would only increase trouble for poor Mary. She cast a contrite look upon her as she left her, and Mary smiled back her pardon. Indeed, Mary could not believe that her father could hold anger towards her; although she knew that Harry Cavanagh was not a pleasant name in his memory. She knew that Harry's father, Edmund Cavanagh, had, in a moment of passion, offended Mr. Lindsay; but she could not conceive of such a matter lingering in the mind year after year; and she thought with unsuspecting childishness, that she could soon heal the breach. Poor Mary! her sixteen years had not yet shown her the world and human nature as they are. She would have been shocked to find how much of rancor existed in her father's heart, and how well he remembered Cavanagh's offence.

The Lindsay mansion stood upon a rising ground, beneath which ran a small river. It was a large pile of buildings, having been added to and altered by each successive owner, but with the original style of architecture preserved. Inside, the spacious apartments presented grandeur combined with true English comfort. The high ceilings, wide fire-places, and immense windows, all told how much the inmates prized free ventilation. In the grand dining-room, for instance, a bay window occupied the entire end of the room, and the drawing-rooms were almost equally favored.

In one of the deep embrasures of the last-mentioned apartments, an hour or two after the hunting party had departed, Mary Lindsay was sitting with her lover. He had feigned to go away that very morning, but knowing that she was to remain at home, he had returned by another route, and found her as he expected, alone. Not until this day, had Mary entertained a doubt that Harry would be approved by her father; nor, indeed, by the sanguine light of youth, could she even now believe that he would persist in his refusal. She was telling Harry this, and together they were drawing bright pictures of the future. An hour passed all too soon, and it was scarcely a moment after, that Mr. Lindsay's horse was heard approaching the house. Mary knew his step, and nearly fainted with terror, lest her father should think that she was aware of the visit she was to receive from Cavanagh.

"Do not tremble so, Mary," said the young man; "your father is surely too just to visit any punishment upon you for what I have done. I will go this moment, and tell him all."

He rose, and walked out to the court yard, just as Mr. Lindsay approached. He met Harry with a look of resentment, while the young man hastened to explain.

"There is no need of explanation, Mr. Cavanagh. I see how much honor I may expect from one of your name. I have only to bid you good morning."

Mortified and incensed, Harry Cavanagh lingered only long enough to whisper a single sentence in Mary's ear, which she was too insensible to comprehend, and then turned down the shortest garden path to the road, where his horse was awaiting him. Mr. Lindsay carried

Mary to her chamber, and she was soon able to comprehend what had passed. Her father soothed her with tender words and caresses, and talked to her as one would to a child; and indeed, Mary was scarce more than that. Hitherto she had been petted and indulged, and no one had ever thought of her being sought by a lover. It was a manifest injustice to her elder sisters, and they resented it like an insult. But young as she was, Mr. Lindsay would not have objected, had it not been Harry Cavanagh who sought her. In other days Horace Lindsay and Edmund Cavanagh were friends. Both loved a fair and gentle girl, and for awhile Horace was preferred. He woke from a long dream of happiness to find that his friend had supplanted him in her affections. He never forgave him—never even spoke to him afterwards. The injury rankled, even when he married Mary's mother, for even then he had but half a heart to offer. And now, when he reflected that this was to be brought up anew to the memory of all those who knew his early mortification; when he thought how every one would speak of his daughter's lover as the son of her who jilted, and of him who outwitted him, the proud spirit of Horace Lindsay rose against the son as it had against the parents, and he inwardly vowed that it should not take place. But he found that Mary could not, child as she was, be intimidated by threats. She must be soothed, caressed into obedience; and he determined to appeal to her filial tenderness, rather than to her sense of duty. At all events, whatever was the cost, whatever the sacrifice, these two hearts must be separated.

Harry Cavanagh did not know of this feud, when he entered Mr. Lindsay's house as a visitor. Young Falkland Lindsay, a relative, had been invited to pass a few days at the mansion, and had declined on the score of having a young friend staying with him. Mr. Lindsay, with characteristic hospitality, had written to him to bring his friend too; and no name was spoken until the two young men arrived. Even then, Mr. Lindsay's habitual politeness could not be laid aside, and he continued to treat his unconscious guest with urbanity, until he suspected from what dropped from some one, that he had been seeking the affections of his daughter. This then, was the reason of Mary's staying away from the sport. Not a moment would he lose in commanding her to dismiss all thoughts of a Cavanagh from her heart. And with this full in his mind, he galloped home as soon as possible, meaning to take her back with him, and interest her in something more suited to her age than a lover. The sight of Harry's horse at the gate showed him that he was too late. He did not doubt that the engagement was already made that bound his daughter to the son of his enemy. His enemy! There was not a drop of blood in Edmund Cavanagh's veins that would not have flowed as freely as water to save the life of the Horace Lindsay whom he knew in youth.

Harry returned home after leaving Mary Lindsay, on the morning of the hunt. Mr. Cavanagh's estate was about thirty miles from Mr. Lindsay's, and although it could not boast the ancient grandeur of the other, was still very pleasant, comfortable, and in many parts really beautiful.

Mr. Cavanagh was a fine, pleasant looking, elderly man, white-haired and venerable. No drop of acid was mixed with his invariable sweetness of disposition. He was uniformly kind and pleasant to all with whom he was in any sort connected. Not a feeling had he ever experienced towards Horace Lindsay, save that of kindness; and his only sorrow was that his friend should have so interpreted his position as to call him an enemy. Harry, whose confidence his father had always shared, related all that had passed in the few days which he had spent at Mr. Lindsay's.

"Alas!" said Mr. Cavanagh, "can it be that the old feud has not yet died out of Horace Lindsay's heart?"

"So it appears," answered Harry, and proceeded with his relation.

"He is wrong—always was wrong about this matter. Harry, he had been once engaged to your mother. He neglected her, and told me himself that he had lost his love for her. I never interfered, until I knew she was perfectly free from her bonds to him. Then he grew furious—accused us both of deception, and since that time I have never been able to meet his eye. He has avoided me as one would a serpent; but with all this wrong resting upon my mind, I would do anything—make any sacrifice for him I so dearly loved in youth."

"Father, will you tell Mr. Lindsay this?"

"Why should I not? I have often longed to recover his friendship, and can I do it in a better cause than the happiness of his child and mine?"

The guests had all departed from Lindsay House, and the family restored to its usual quiet ways. Mary's face was a trifle paler than its wonted hue, and her spirits had lost something of their tone. Her father had been alarmed at this, and had treated her with all possible kindness and consideration, not even mentioning their late dissension. He was alone with her now, in the pleasant, sunny, morning room, enlivened still further by a bright wood fire. Mr. Lindsay was reading at the fireside, with a noble hound crouched beneath him on the rug, while Mary was vainly striving to busy herself with her work. It had fallen from her hand, and her father was looking at her over his book, with a pitying expression on his face. A stranger was announced, and ushered into the room. Mr. Lindsay rose and bowed with involuntary respect to the dignified, white-haired man who came towards him.

"I perceive that you do not recognize me, Mr. Lindsay," said the stranger, "and perhaps my name will bring no welcome. I am Edmund Cavanagh."

Mr. Lindsay started, and his proffered hand fell to his side.

"May I ask why Mr. Cavanagh thinks proper to awake unpleasant memories, by thus calling on one who never solicited that honor?"

"The reason lies in the unhappiness of my son—my only remaining child—and in the hope that two gray-headed men may bury the remembrance of a foolish and unfounded enmity before they die."

"Foolish and unfounded!" repeated Mr. Lindsay.

He motioned to Mary to withdraw; but she first caught an almost paternal look from the stranger, from which she augured a pleasant ending to this strange interview. What passed between her father and Mr. Cavanagh no one ever knew; but two hours afterward they came down the covered walk where she was sitting, and by the serene calm upon their faces, she knew they were reconciled. Just then, the whole bevy of sisters appeared at the gate, returned from their morning ride, and as Mary turned on hearing their voices, she was electrified by the sight of Harry Cavanagh, in the act of lifting Belle from her horse.

"Go, and meet your sisters," was all that Mr. Lindsay said, but he looked still more, and when Mary came back, it was with Harry alone. He had accompanied his father, but did not venture to approach the house, until the length of the interview convinced him that it was not a hostile one.

How sweetly looked the bride, as she stood by Harry's side in the grand drawing-room of Lindsay House, I cannot describe, although I have looked with delight upon the beautiful representations of the artist, which bring all the scenes I have recorded before the eye.

There are some men, whose enemies are to be pitied much, and their friends more.

Curious Matters.

Remarkable Death.

The awful death of Madame Palestikoff, one of the most charming amongst all that bevy of charming Russian ladies who sometimes gladdened the winters of Paris, has created a terrible shock in the circles she embellished. The unhappy lady left Paris but a short time ago on a summer tour to Germany. While stepping from the door of the opera-house, at Berlin to gain her carriage, she let fall one of her bracelets close to the pavement. Stooping to pick it up, she noticed at the time laughingly, "that one of the horses belonging to a carriage standing at hand had dropped his head so close to her face that he had touched her, and left a moist kiss upon her cheek." In a few days the unfortunate lady was taken ill with that most horrible disease, glanders, and in a few days more breathed her last, in spite of her attendance by the best physicians in Berlin, and every resource to be obtained by wealth, or by ceaseless vigilance of friends.

Humming Birds' Tongues.

The tongue of a humming bird is very curious. It has two tubes alongside of each other, like the two tubes of a double barrelled gun. At the tip of the tongue the tubes are a little separated, and their ends are shaped like spoons. The honey is spooned up, as we may say, and then it is drawn into the mouth through the long tubes of the tongue. But the bird uses its tongue another way. It catches insects with it, for it lives on these as well as on honey. It catches them in this way: the two spoons grasp the insect like a pair of tongs, and the tongue bending, puts it into the bird's mouth. The tongue, then, of the humming bird is not merely one instrument, but contains several instruments together—two pumps, two spoons, and a pair of tongs.

A Shower of Flies.

A recent number of the St. Louis Democrat says: "On the down trip of the Steamer Editor, on the Illinois, the other night, at nine o'clock, a shower or stream of the Mormon or Shad-fly poured upon her deck to the depth of six inches, and it was a very difficult matter to shovel them overboard. They were so numerous as to put out the watchman's light and envelope everything in midnight darkness. The trees along the shore looked as if borne down by these short-lived insects. The visitation is said to prognosticate a sickly season."

Singular Suicide.

Edward Cole committed suicide near St. Peter, Minnesota, under singular circumstances. He took down his gun, when by some accident it went off and killed his wife. He wrote to his son informing him of the circumstance, and telling him what disposition to make of his property. He said that himself and wife had not lived on good terms, and that as the accident on his part might be attributed to design, he would prevent any further trouble by leaving the world.

Strange Incident.

A husbandman in the little village of St. Omer, in France, recently killed a hog, in the stomach of which was discovered a silver watch and chain, that was lost two months before, and which belonged to a servant of the house. The timepiece—being of hunting pattern, well encased—was found black as coal.

A Microscopic Wonder.

We have had the pleasure of seeing recently, says the Salem Register, a microscopic photograph, which is truly a very remarkable curiosity. Upon the object glass appears a small speck, occupying the space of six by seven and a half hundredths of an inch—about the size of the square lead in an ordinary lead pencil before it is cut—appearing to the unaided vision only as a stain or slight discoloration upon the glass. But the microscope reveals it to be a complete copy of the Declaration of Independence, with the names of the signers in full, containing no less than 7860 letters, every one of which is a finished specimen of typography, and the whole, under a high magnifying power can be seen with the utmost distinctness, and read with the utmost ease. The letters are only one twenty-four hundredths of an inch in size, but are perfectly formed and elegant. This wonderful achievement of the photographic art was brought from Paris, by Mr. D. P. Ives, and is the property of Dr. George A. Perkins.

Action of the Sea.

In Clew Bay, on the western coast of Ireland, there was formerly an island called Minish, the surface of which, in the reign of Charles I., was several acres in extent, as is proved by several public documents of that period. On being measured in the year 1814, it was found to be only 420 feet long, and thirty broad. In 1816 it entirely disappeared. The island of Clare, in the immediate neighborhood, furnishes another example of the destructive action of the sea along those coasts. Bounded everywhere by cliffs of immense height, it is continually corroded by the ocean, which has worn deep caverns, into which, when agitated, it throws immense blocks of stone, detached from the cliffs, with a noise that is quite appalling.

The Shroud of Pizarro.

The Michigan Historical Society has received from Mr. C. C. Jackson a relic, which is said to be a veritable scrap of the mort cloth or shroud of Pizarro. By good fortune (says the donor) I managed one day when in Lima, the "city of the kings," to penetrate into the vaulted depths under the great altar of the old cathedral, and finally to stand by the skeleton of the great freebooter. The custodian of the remains was accessible, and I was enabled to obtain the enclosed bit of the once gorgeous cerements in which the remains were wrapped on their final burial in the place of honor.

Outlived her Legatees.

Mrs. Villette, of La Salle, was buried recently in the Catholic burying-ground at Monroe, Michigan. She was 112 years old at the time of her death. She made her will in the latter part of the last century, over sixty years ago, and what is most singular, she has outlived all the persons to whom she had bequeathed her property, several of whom were infants when the will was made, and over fifty years of age when they died.

High Waterfall.

The highest waterfall in the world is in the Sandwich Islands, and is stated to be four or five thousand feet high. The stream on which the fall occurs runs among the peaks of one of the highest mountains—so high that the water actually never reaches the bottom—so great is the distance that the water is converted into mist, and ascends to the clouds again.

A Feathered Malefactor.

Several persons while promenading a short time since on the borders of the canal, between the bridge of Charlotenbourg and the Zoological Garden of Berlin, perceived a swan, which, visibly exhausted, was swimming down the channel and endeavoring to gain the brink. But before he had arrived there, one of his companions, which was pursuing him through the waves, caught the fugitive, dragged him to the middle of the canal, and pressing his claws against the unlucky swan, seized him by the head, and plunged him very forcibly under water till death ensued. As there was no boat in the vicinity, the spectators of this scene gave chase to the murderer by throwing stones at him, but all in vain. The feathered malefactor did not shrink for a moment from the execution of his design.

Older than Parr.

Old Parr died in 1635, aged 152, having lived in ten reigns. But a greater than Parr was Henry Jenkins, of Yorkshire, who died in 1670, aged 169 years. It is recorded of this venerable man of old, that he once surprised a company who were putting questions about his age, by telling them that he had been present at the battle of Flodden Field, in 1513, and he distinctly described the circumstances as to how he had been in contact with the memorable battle. He was a boy at the period, and acted as driver to one of the wagons, which was laden with sheaves of arrows for the bowmen. The case of Jenkins is classed in the list of remarkable persons as authentic. It would be curious to know how such a person fared in life. He would certainly hold no bad bank stock, nor fret amid the consuming eagerness of a race for wealth.

Can a Man be his own Grandfather?

The query answered in the affirmative: "There was a widow and her daughter-in-law, and a man and his son. The widow married the son, and the daughter the old man; the widow was, therefore mother to her husband's father, consequently grandmother to her own husband. They had a son to whom she was great grandmother. Now as the son of a grandmother must be either a grandfather or a great uncle, this boy was therefore his own grandfather. N. B. This was actually the case with a boy at school at Norwich.

Pancake Bell.

A custom has prevailed in Haden from time immemorial, on Shrove Tuesday, to ring what is called the pancake-bell. All the apprentices in the town whose indentures terminate before the return of the above day, assemble in the belfry of the church at eleven o'clock, and in turn toll the tenor bell for an hour, at the sound of which all the housewives in the parish commence frying pancakes. The sexton, who is present, receives a small fee from each lad.

A Prodigy.

Another mathematical phenomenon has appeared. His name is Meredith Holland, and he is a native of Monroe county, Ky. It is said that he can answer any mathematical question without a moment's delay. He declares that he is conscious of no mental effort, but the answer is presented to his mind almost instantaneously with the question. Aside from this wonderful faculty he has a very ordinary and uncultivated mind.

Singular Historical Facts.

Thomas Jefferson and John Adams both died on the 4th of July, 1826. John Adams died in his 91st year and was eight years older than Thomas Jefferson; Thomas Jefferson was eight years older than James Madison; James Madison was eight years older than James Monroe; James Monroe was eight years older than John Quincy Adams. The first five of our Presidents—all Revolutionary men—ended their terms of services in the 66th year of their age. Washington, born Feb. 22d, 1732; inaugurated 1789; term of service expired in the 66th year of his age; John Adams, born October 30th, 1735; inaugurated, 1797; term of service expired in the 66th year of his age; Thomas Jefferson, born April 2d, 1743; inaugurated 1804; term of service expired in the 66th year of his age; James Madison, born March 4th, 1751; inaugurated 1809; term of service expired in the 66th year of his age; James Monroe, born April 2d, 1758; inaugurated 1817; term of service expired in the 66th year of his age.

Curious Epitaph.

The following epitaph is upon a gravestone in Crayford churchyard, Kent:

"Here lies the body of Peter Isnell, thirty years Clerk of this parish: he lived respected, a pious and worthy man, and died on his way to Church to assist at a wedding, on the 31st August, 1811, aged 70 years. The inhabitants of Crayford raised this stone to his cheerful memory, and as a tribute to his faithful service.

"The life of this clerk was just threescore and ten,
Nearly half of which time he had sung out amen.
In his youth he was married like other young men,
But his wife died one day: so he chanted amen.
A second he took—she departed: what then?
He courted and married a third, with amen;
His joys and his sorrows were doubled: but then
His voice was deep bass as he sung out amen.
On the horn was exalted in blowing amen,
He lost all his wind at threescore and ten;
And here, with three wives, he waits till again
The trumpet shall raise him to sing out Amen."

Sir Philip Crampton's Coffin.

By the singular directions of Sir Philip Crampton, made just prior to his death, the body was placed in a solid Irish oak coffin without any lid; around this was placed a thick concrete of Roman cement, which was made to fill up all the spaces in the interior of the coffin not occupied by the body, which was covered over, and entirely imbedded in the cement, of which nearly five hundred weight was used. The heavy mass was placed within another Irish oak coffin of great strength, which was covered with fine black cloth, on the lid of which was a shield bearing the following inscription: "Sir Philip Crampton, Bart, died June 10th, 1853, aged eighty-one years."

"Big Tree Bulletin."

This is the odd-sounding and somewhat remarkable title of a paper issued at Mammoth Tree Grove, Calaveras county, California. It is published every Tuesday and Friday by John Heckendern—office on the stump of the Big Tree. In the Calaveras section of California trees are found of a size surpassing those of any other country in the world. One of these giants has been felled, and upon its stump the editor has erected a printing office, from which issues, twice a week, the Big Tree Bulletin.

The Florist.

Now comes the beautiful summer time,
And grass grows green once more,
And sparkling brooks the meadows lave
With fertilizing power.—DOCTA DE TRON'S.

Destroying Insects.

Sowing a garden with salt, at the rate of six or eight bushels to the acre, will cause many insects to disappear. It should be done in the autumn. Digging the soil in winter, and thus exposing it to the frost, will destroy many grubs, etc. Wine-mouthed bottles, partly filled with molasses and water, and hung up in the garden, make excellent traps for the moths, which are the parents of many destructive insects. The remedy is an old fashioned but good one. A bright fire of resinous pine, too, shavings, or any other combustible, kindled in the garden at night, will attract and destroy millions of bugs. Birds are among the best friends of the garden, and should by no means be destroyed, although some of them may eat raspberries and cherries. Toads live entirely upon insects, and do no harm in the garden. Induce as many as possible to make it their home.

Roses.

Now is the season in which to train roses. Those plants which have done flowering now put forth vigorous shoots, and great care should be taken to train the young wood in the proper directions. Too many shoots should not be allowed to grow—pinch off as many as you please, the plants will grow the better for it. Every fifth or sixth year the roses should be taken up, their roots shortened, and replanted in fresh soil, the old soil being removed; and every year in March, about half a barrel of well rotted manure should be laid on the surface of the ground round the stem of the tree, and spread out so as to cover the roots.

Grafting Wax.

To make grafting wax of an excellent quality, take four parts of resin, two of beeswax, and one of tallow; melt the whole together, pour the composition into cold water, and work it over thoroughly, pulling it as you would molasses candy. The hardness of the wax may be increased or lessened by adding more or less tallow. In cold weather keep the composition in warm water. In using it the hands should be slightly greased.

Pinks.

If you have any choice kind of pinks watch them carefully, and do not allow two buds to grow on the same stem; pinch off the smallest; by so doing the plants flower more vigorously, and the blossoms will be more perfect.

Evergreens.

All evergreens of a hard-wooded nature may be increased rapidly by layers in June or July. Lay down the young shoots and cover them five or six inches deep with earth, leaving the tops out three or four inches, according to their different lengths.

Hedycarum.

The French Honeysuckle. The species are mostly hardy biennials and perennials, which require only the usual treatment of their respective kinds. They will grow in any light rich soil, and are increased by division of their roots and by seed.

Flowers from Seed.

Among the flowers most interesting to raise from the seed we may mention the pansy, or heartsease. A pinch of seed sown now, and occasionally watered in dry weather till it is up, would be ready to plant out by the end of August. It will produce a great variety, from which the best may be saved. These, like many other flower-seeds, may be sown in April or May, but we sow them in all three of the months we mention; this flower in particular, because a very small garden will do for them, for they need not be planted out more than six inches apart.

Hot-House Climbers.

All the most beautiful hot-house climbers, such as the Allamanda Cathartica, the Ipomoea Horsfalliae, Petrea Volubilis, etc., may be grown in the open air, by keeping their roots in heat; that is to say, if the roots are grown in a stove, or pit heated with hot water or fires of stove heat; the stems may be brought through some opening purposely contrived, and twined over a trellis in the open garden.

Young Trees.

Young trees, two or three years from the seed, or one year from the graft, are not infrequently headed down to two or three buds on purpose to strengthen their growth. A single bud is then trained vertically, and the rest pruned away in the course of the summer. In such cases, the growth of the top being attended with a corresponding increase of fibrous roots, the tree at once becomes vigorous and healthy.

Petunias.

No class of summer flowers better repay the small care they require, than petunias; they are a mass of bright fragrant blossoms from June to November, and are a great addition to any flower garden, whether planted in patches, vases or pots. There are many varieties of petunias, all beautiful and very hardy. A bed of choice plants in full bloom is a beautiful sight.

The Vegetable Garden.

We must not, in our love of flowers, forget the vegetable garden, although little is required besides frequent hoeing between the different crops; rain closes the surface of the soil, and it is of the greatest benefit to the roots of everything to loosen this and let in air; another great advantage attending it is that it keeps the weeds from growing, and leaves the surface clean.

Plants in the House.

Those who grow plants in dwelling-houses frequently have a neat wire stand inside, instead of confining themselves to the windows. In this case it must be placed so that it shall get all the light; if not, the plants will draw up weakly, and the leaves get pale; and if the room be confined they will suffer still more rapidly.

Asperula.

Woodroof or Woodruff. A hardy herbaceous plant, which deserves culture for its beautiful, sweet-scented white flowers. It is very suitable for rock-work on a large scale, though it increases so rapidly by shoots from the roots as to overrun a small rockery.

Apples.

Certain kinds of apples bear moderately every year. The Belle-fleur and Holland Pippin are the choicest.

Saving Seeds.

Choose the best plants for seeds—the most true to their kind, and the most perfectly developed; allow the seeds to become entirely ripe before gathering them; gather when dry, and especially take care that they are perfectly dry when put up; store them in paper bags carefully labelled, and keep them in a dry cool place. Great care is necessary in raising seeds to procure the sorts unmixed, as varieties of the same species or similar species are almost sure to mix if planted near each other. If you raise more than one kind of pumpkin, melon, squash or corn in the same garden, you cannot be sure of pure seed.

Grafting.

Grafting may be performed at almost any season of the year with scions properly kept; but by far the best time in our climate is from the middle of February, in mild weather, all along until the middle of May at the North, and till the end of March at the South—stone fruits first, and other fruits somewhat later. To produce dwarf trees, apple is grafted upon paradise (or doncin) stocks; the pear upon the quince, thorn, shad-bush or mountain ash; the peach upon the plum; the cherry upon the cerasus mahaleb, and in general, any tree upon any other kindred tree of slower or smaller growth.

Mulching.

Mulching is placing mulch or moist litter of various kinds upon the surface of the soil over the roots of trees, shrubs and herbaceous plants, and is very beneficial. Its uses are the retention of moisture, the prevention of injury by frost, and the promotion of an equable temperature. Strawberries thinly mulched, the crown being uncovered, are rendered more productive and continue longer in beauty, especially in hot, dry climates. Newly planted fruit trees are often greatly benefited by mulching.

Ants.

Ants are very great enemies to flowers and flower seeds; but there is no way to attack them save in their own strongholds, which must be done ruthlessly. The best method is to pour boiling soap suds upon the ant hills, which destroys both the insects and the eggs within the nest. In some places the ants are large and abundant, and they quickly destroy the beauty of a flower by attacking the root and heart.

Frankenia.

Sea-Heath. Dwarf perennials, which should be grown in pots, or on rock-work, in a mixture of loam and peat, and which are increased by seeds or cuttings. The foliage is light and graceful, having some resemblance to the most delicate species of ferns.

Gooseberry Bushes.

To prevent the gooseberry from being attacked by mildew, cover the ground around the roots with a stratum of salt hay, two or three inches thick, and allow it to remain through the season. Irrigation once a week with soap suds, taking care to sprinkle all the foliage with the liquid, will also be beneficial.

Muscari.

The Grape Hyacinth. Bulbous-rooted plants that require only planting in common garden soil, where they may remain several years, flowering every year in succession, without any care being necessary in taking them up.

Layering.

To increase flowering shrubs, rose-bushes, or any plant by layering, dig the ground around it to a good depth; then, with a sharp knife cut between the two joints, half through the stalk or branch, on the under part; turn the edge of the knife upward, and make a slit, carrying it past the first joint, half way to the next one; make a hollow in the ground, and insert the cut part from one to two inches deep, keeping the branch perpendicular, and the slit open. Each layer should be pegged down with a hooked stick made from a twig.

Watering Plants.

Never water flowers or plants when the sun is on them; as it causes them to pine. Always let the water stand in the sun if drawn from a well, until the chill is taken off. There is a very nice flower-pot, recently invented, with a sloping shelf half way down the outside, so that it will hold water; but holes are perforated at the bottom of this gutter through the sides of the pot, so that the soil can be wetted half way down at the same time that it is watered at the top.

Slips and Cuttings.

To raise hardy flowering shrubs by slips or cuttings, let a border be prepared in a shaded and sheltered situation, by mining and deep digging. Provide cuttings about a foot long, insert them in the ground full one third their length, press the ground around the stems, and rake it smooth. If this is done in the spring, with watering in hot weather, and hoeing occasionally, they will be rooted by autumn. If made in autumn, they should be protected by leaves, straw or litter.

Pink culture.

If you water pinks too much their roots become rotten, and if you suffer them to become too dry, they become diseased. Beware of extremes. The best way is to keep them just moist. The tendency of pinks is to spread out flat, but if allowed to do so the plants droop and dwindle; better keep them tied up to little sticks. The leaves of fine pinks should be rounded, not pointed.

Scions.

Scions are of two sorts; those properly so called, and buds. A scion is a cutting or portion of a plant caused to grow upon another plant, from which it extracts fluid for its leaf buds, and thus becomes gradually united to it.

Cuttings.

Cuttings should be made from shoots or stalks of a prior year's growth. Those that are well ripened should be selected, having joints not far apart, cut so as to have three or four joints in each.

Suckers.

Suckers are in reality young plants connected with the parent at the root, which should be carefully separated and transplanted.

Layers.

Layers differ from cuttings in nothing except that they strike root in the soil while yet adhering to the parent plant.

Budding Roses.

Budding is best performed on rose-trees in August, as the buds are generally matured, so that the bark parts freely from the wood.

The Housewife.

Wild Fowl.

The flavor of wild fowl is best preserved by not stuffing them; put into each, pepper, salt, and a bit of butter. Wild fowl do not require so much dressing as tame; they should be done of a fine color, and nicely frothed. A rich brown gravy should be served in the dish, and when the breast is cut into slices, before it is taken from the bone, it will be much improved by a squeeze of lemon, some salt and pepper. If you wish to take off the fishy smell which these birds frequently have, put an onion, salt, and hot water into the dripping pan, and for the first ten minutes baste them with this; then remove the pan, and keep constantly basting with butter.

Lemon Marmalade.

Allow to a pound of lemons eighteen ounces of fine loaf sugar; grate the rind of a few; cut them into half; squeeze and strain the juice; boil the skins in two quarts of water slowly, till reduced to one pint; scoop out the pulp and white part; cut half into thin chips or parings, and pound the other half in a mortar; pound the sugar, and pour over it the juice; stir, and let it boil for five minutes; skim it; take it off the fire; put in the parings and the pounded skins; boil it for five minutes, then add the grated peel, and let it boil for five minutes more; take it off, and stir it till half cold, before putting it into jars.

Rolls.

Rub into a pound of sifted flour, two ounces of butter; beat the whites of three eggs to a froth, and add a tablespoonful of good yeast, a little salt, and sufficient warm milk to make a stiff dough. Cover and put it where it will be kept warm, and it will rise in an hour. Then make it into rolls, or round cakes; put them on a floured tin, and bake in a quick oven or stove. They will be done in ten or fifteen minutes.

Effervescing Lemonade.

Tartaric acid, 50 parts; bicarbonate of soda, 30 parts; powdered lump-sugar, 200 parts; essence of lemon to flavor. Mix in fine powder and keep it dry, if for powders; but if for bottling, put it into a soda-water bottle, and fill it up with water; cork down as quick as possible. This may also be made in the same way as soda-water, only adding the extra articles.

To procure Green Peas in Winter.

Take the peas when they are plenty, shell them, wash and scald in hot water, then drain, put them into bottles, and pour strong brine on them until they are perfectly covered; over this pour a thin layer of good salad oil, and cork tight, then dip the corks into melted pitch. The bottles should be quite full and kept upright.

Candles.

Prepare your wicks about half the usual size, wet with spirits of turpentine, put them into the sun until dry, then mould or dip your candles. Candles thus made last longer, and give a much clearer light. In fact they are nearly or quite equal to sperm, in clearness of light.

Ink Stains.

To remove stains of ink from the hands, rub them immediately with salt and lemon juice mixed together.

Orange Marmalade.

The juice of two dozen sweet oranges, and one dozen bitter oranges; the peels (rinds) of twelve sweet, and six bitter oranges; and five pounds and a half of sugar. Boil the rinds in two quarts of water slowly, till reduced to one pint. This will take an hour and a half, and in this time the rinds will be soft. Mix the pint of rind-water with the orange-juice and sugar, and put it on the fire. Cut the rinds into chips; and when the syrup boils, add them, and boil slowly twenty minutes. Put the marmalade in small jars, tie dry paper over, and keep in a dry place. In paring the oranges leave a little white on the rinds. The syrup of this marmalade is quite clear and thick, and the receipt is much liked.

Pigeons.

Pigeons are better for being freshly cooked; their flavor passes off in a day or two. When cleaned and ready for roasting, prepare some stuffing of bread crumbs and about three oysters to each bird, a spoonful of butter, a little salt and nutmeg. Mix these well together, and fill the belly of the bird. They must be well basted with melted butter, and require thirty minutes careful cooking. When full grown, and in the autumn, they are best. For a sauce, take the gravy which runs from them, thicken with a very little flour and some chopped parsley. Serve hot. This bird is in perfection when it has just done growing.

An Irish Stew.

Take a loin of mutton, cut it into chops, season it with a very little pepper and salt, put it into a saucepan, just cover it with water and let it cook half an hour. Boil two dozen of potatoes, peel and mash them, and stir in a cup of cream while they are hot; then line a deep dish with the potatoes, and lay in the cooked mutton chops, and cover them over with the rest of the potatoes; then set it in the oven to bake. Make some gravy of the broth in which the chops were cooked. This is a very nice dish.

Maccaroni Cordial.

This favorite French liqueur is very little known abroad. Put into half a pint of spirits of wine half an ounce of the oil of bitter almonds; shake it up two or three times a day for three days; infuse the above for ten days, with one ounce of Spanish angelica root, in three gallons of brandy, one drachm of the essence of lemon, three quarts of clarified sugar, two quarts of mille-feur-water and five quarts of soft water, then filter the whole through a bag.

Cream of Roses.

Oil of almonds, 1 pound; rosewater, 1 pint; white wax and spermaceti, each, 1 ounce. Mix in a pipkin with a little heat, then add essence of neroli, 20 drops; otto of roses, 15 drops. Put it into pots and tie it over with skin or oiled leather.

Nutmeg Pudding.

Pound, fine, two large or three small nutmegs; melt three pounds of butter, and stir into it half a pound of loaf-sugar, a little wine, the yolks of five eggs, well beaten, and the nutmegs. Bake on a puff paste.

Camphorated Vinegar.

To make camphorated vinegar, reduce half an ounce of camphor to a very fine powder, mix it with a little rectified spirit, and dissolve it in six ounces of acetic acid.

To Bake a Ham.

Put the ham in soak previous to dressing it; if an old one, two hours will be required, but if not very old, an hour will suffice. Wipe it very dry, and cover it with a paste about an inch in thickness. The edges being first moistened must be drawn together, and made to adhere, or the gravy will escape. Bake it in a regular, well-heated oven; it will take from three to six hours, according to its weight; when done remove the paste, and then the skin. This must be done while the ham is hot. If well baked and not too salt, it will prove of finer flavor than if boiled.

A cheap Filter.

Put a piece of sponge at the bottom of a large flower pot, and fill the pot three-quarters full with clean, sharp sand and small pieces of charcoal, mixed in equal parts. Lay upon this mixture a piece of linen or woolen cloth, so as to hang over the sides. The water poured through this will come out at the bottom clean and pure. The cloth must be kept clean, and the sand and charcoal, as well as the sponge, washed and occasionally changed,

French Mustard.

French mustard is frequently made as follows: one ounce of mustard, two pinches of salt, and a large wine-glass full of boiling water are mixed, and allowed to stand for twenty-four hours. Then pound in a mortar one clove of garlic, a small handful of tarragon, another of garden-oreg, and add these ingredients to the mustard, putting vinegar according to taste.

Buckwheat Cakes.

To one quart of buckwheat flour add half a cup of yeast, a cup of cream, a table-spoonful of salt, and make a thin batter with warm water. After beating them well together, set the mixture to rise for about eight hours; heat the griddle and rub it with a dry cloth well saturated with salt. Bake in small cakes.

Unbolted Wheat Bread.

To five pounds of flour well mixed with nearly a table-spoonful of salt, add a cup and a half of yeast, a cup of molasses, and about a pint of warm water. Unbolted wheat bread is more wholesome than bolted wheat. It should be upon every table, and eaten at least a part of the time.

Currant Jelly.

Take of red or black currant juice one pound, sugar six ounces. Boil them down to a jelly; it will want two hours' boiling with the above quantity of sugar. The liquor poured off when making jam will settle into a jelly. To try it, put a drop on a cold plate, and see it congeal.

To remove Stains from Books.

To remove ink spots, apply a solution of oxalic, citric, or tartaric acid. To remove spots of grease, wax, oil, or fat, wash the injured part with ether, and place it between white blotting-paper. Then, with a hot iron, press above the part stained.

Gooseberry Jam.

To every quart of ripe red gooseberries use two pounds of sugar, bruise the fruit, and boil it with the sugar, until upon taking a little up and letting it cool, it will be found to set into a stiff jam. Half an hour's boiling is sufficient.

Batter Pudding.

Take six ounces of fine flour, a little salt, and three eggs; beat it up well with a little milk, added by degrees till the batter is quite smooth; make it the thickness of cream; put it into a buttered pie-dish, and bake three quarters of an hour; or, in a buttered and floured basin, tied over tight with a cloth; boil one hour and a half or two hours. Any kind of ripe fruit that you like may be added to the batter—only you must make the batter a little stiffer. Blueberries, or finely-chopped apple, are most usually liked.

Lobster Sauce.

Put the spawn of a lobster into a mortar, with a bit of butter and well pound it; then rub it through a fine sieve; put some butter sauce into a stewpan, and the spawn of the lobster; set it on the fire till it is very hot, and looks quite smooth and red; if not smooth, pass it through a sieve; then put in the meat of the lobster, cut into small slices; make it very hot; squeeze in a little lemon juice, and serve.

Oyster Sauce.

Save the liquor in opening the oysters, and boil it with a bit of mace and lemon peel. In the meantime, throw the oysters into cold water, and drain it off. Strain the liquor, and put it into a saucepan with them, and as much butter, mixed with a little milk, as will make sauce enough; but first rub a little flour with it.

Dyspepsia Bread.

The following receipt for making bread, has proved highly salutary to persons afflicted with dyspepsia, viz:—Three quarts unbolted wheat meal; one quart soft water, warm, but not hot; one gill of fresh yeast; one gill of molasses, or not, as may suit the taste; one teaspoonful of saleratus.

Cauliflower.

Choose one that is white; take off the outside leaves, put it in boiling water with some salt. Skim and boil it slowly; when done, take it up in a colander, and press out the water. Put it in a vegetable dish, cover with drawn butter, and serve while hot.

Pickled Eggs.

Boil one dozen eggs until hard; put them in cold water, take off the shells, put them in a jar with half an ounce of mace, the same of cloves, allspice and whole pepper. Season your vinegar with salt to taste; heat it, and pour it over when cold.

Tomatoes dressed as Cucumbers.

Pour boiling water over and let them stand a few minutes. Take them out, remove the skins, and when they become cold, slice them and season with salt and red pepper. A little vinegar may be added for those who like it.

Lemon Cake.

Beat to a foam three cups of sugar, and two of rich cream; add the yolks of three well-beaten eggs, the juice and grated peel of a lemon, and the whites of five eggs. Add to these four cups of flour as lightly as possible. Bake half an hour.

Corn Pie.

To twelve ears of green corn grated, add half a pint of rich cream, two eggs, salt to the taste, a little mace, and a pickled lobster. Stir all together, and bake it with or without thin paste.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

A YOUNG HERO.

A little boy in Holland was returning one night from a village to which he had been sent by his father on an errand, when he noticed the water trickling through a narrow opening in the dike. He stopped and thought what the consequences would be if the hole was not closed. He knew, for he had often heard his father tell the sad disasters which happened from such small beginnings; how, in a few hours, the opening would become bigger and bigger, and let in the mighty mass of waters pressing on the dike, until the whole defence being washed away, the rolling, dashing, angry waters would sweep on to the next village, destroying life and property, and everything in its way. Should he run home and alarm the villagers, it would be dark before they could arrive, and the hole might even then be so large as to defy all attempts to close it. Prompted by these thoughts, he seated himself on the bank of the canal, stopped the opening with his hand, and patiently awaited the approach of some villager. But no one came. Hour after hour rolled by, yet there sat the heroic boy, in cold and darkness, shivering, wet, and tired, but stoutly pressing his hand against the dangerous breach. All night he stayed at his post. At last the morning broke. A clergyman walking up the canal heard a groan, and looked round to see where it came from. "Why are you there, my child?" he asked, seeing the boy, and surprised at his strange position. "I am keeping back the water, sir, and saving the village from being drowned," answered the child, with lips so benumbed with cold that he could scarcely speak. The astonished minister relieved the boy. The dike was closed, and the danger which threatened hundreds of lives was prevented.

A TRUTH.—The present evil is often the husk in which Providence has enclosed the germ of future prosperity.

SIMILARITY.—In the United States there are said to be six thousand brokers and six thousand barbers.

RESOLUTION.—There is no magic, no miracle, no secret to him who is brave in heart and determined in spirit.

LIEBIG.

The following account of the eminent chemist, Liebig, is from a European correspondent of Moore's Rural New Yorker:—"On the last day which I passed in Munich, I went to hear the world-renowned chemist, Liebig, lecture. His laboratory and lecture-room are in the same house in which he resides. When he entered the lecture-room the students all rose to receive him, and he acknowledged their attention with a polite bow. He wore a black dress coat and white pantaloons. Liebig is a fine, intellectual-looking man, tall though not broad; has iron-gray hair, which has fallen off from his broad and projecting forehead; he wears no beard. He lectures in a very conversational manner, part of the time sitting; makes many gestures, and good ones too. His face is expressive. He is indeed a good deal of an orator, and perhaps the best popular lecturer in Germany. Liebig was 56 years old on the 12th of May, 1857. He was born in Darmstadt, and at the age of 21 was made professor at Giessen. In 1852 he came to Munich. Between the years 1832 and 1856 he published one hundred and seventy-seven papers, many of which were very elaborate. He is said to be proud and overbearing; he is, however, on the side of progress, and heads the reform party in the University."

INDECISION.—The most remarkable instance of indecision we ever heard of, was that of the man who sat up all night, because he could not decide which to take off first, his coat or his boots.

THE BUSYBODY.—He labors without thanks, talks without credit, lives without love, dies without tears, without pity—save that some say, "It was a pity he died no sooner."

HAPPINESS.—If you cannot be happy in one way you can in another. This is not an affair of philosophy, but of health and good humor.

PERSONAL VANITY.—We all unconscious of our own defects. The hunchback does not see the protuberance on his own shoulders.

THE OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

The most wonderful triumph of human genius that the present age has witnessed, has lately been accomplished, in the laying of the Electric Telegraph Cable from Europe to America, beneath the deep waters of the Atlantic. This triumph is not simply the submerging a continuous line of cable beneath the ocean waves,—an exploit difficult enough in itself; but it relates back to the sublime discovery which appropriated the mysterious and noble agent called electricity, to the instantaneous transmission of human language to distant points, along a conducting wire. The application of this wonderful power to a wire cable stretching for thousands of miles along the bed of the ocean, and buried for miles beneath its boisterous surface, is the triumph of human skill and industry, which has just been heralded to the world. The triumph is complete. Time and distance have been overcome, and man speaks to man across the raging ocean, as though standing face to face and grasping him by the hand.

To the indomitable energy of Cyrus W. Field, is the world indebted for the accomplishment of this stupendous achievement. He it was that took up the suggestion of electric communication between Europe and America, and gave to it a practical realization. Amidst coldness and incredulity he persevered, until at length he enlisted the capitalists of Great Britain and of this country in the undertaking, and procured the essential aid of the national vessels of the two countries in making the attempt. Yet, hard as was his task, to bring about this combination of private capital and government assistance upon an enterprise of such unsurpassed magnitude, and so entirely novel, it was as nothing compared to the ordeal of mental anxiety and toil which awaited him, after the means were placed within his reach. The work was now before him, and the experiment was to be tried, whether he was equal to the task of organizing the forces placed at his disposal, and directing them to a successful result. Trial after trial was made with the apparatus which was provided for the work, and failure after failure took place. In addition to the mechanical obstacles which from time to time revealed themselves, and caused these failures; in addition to the unanticipated raging of the elements, to such a degree as almost to swamp the vessels in mid-ocean, were arrayed against him the solemn doubts and sage misgivings of men of science, who prognosticated that the electric laws would forbid the operation of the ocean cable, even if successfully laid. He had the faith to stand up against all such disasters and forebodings, the courage to hold his mind steadily to the end in view, in spite of every obstacle; and the manly fortitude to call for a sixth attempt after five had failed. The sixth has been made; and pealing bells and thundering cannon, all over both continents, have announced and celebrated its successful result.

The British Frigate Agamemnon, and the United States Frigate Niagara, joined their respective ends of the telegraphic cable in mid-ocean, on Thursday afternoon, July 29th, and in seven days, viz., on Thursday, August 5th, they landed the opposite ends on the European and American coasts. The total amount of cable paid out by the Agamemnon, between the point of junction in mid-ocean and the Irish coast, was 1010 miles, and the length paid out by the Niagara, between the same point and the American coast, was 1016 miles. During the momentous seven days while the work was going on, Mr. Field, who was on board the Niagara, kept a daily journal of its progress. Our readers can imagine the intense anxiety with which he watched the slow movement of the cable over the vessel's stern day and night, during that period, and listened to the frequent reports of the electricians as to the state of the communication between the two ends of the twenty-two hundred miles of cable that lay coiled upon the decks of two vessels, or submerged at the bottom of the sea. On the evening of the first day, there was a complete failure of electric communication; the depth of the sea being nearly ten thousand feet, and the vessels twenty-five miles apart. But he was not disheartened even at this appalling indication, and "kept paying out very slowly, and constantly applying all kinds of electrical tests." In two hours the light of hope again dawned upon him. The cheering certainty that the connection was restored, was indicated by the renewal of electric signals from the Agamemnon, and the joyful order was given to renew the usual speed. Again, at midnight on the fifth day, when the ships were over twelve hundred miles apart, imperfect electrical action was a second time discovered, indicating that some part of the wire was not properly insulated. Here was another sad foreboding of ultimate failure; for where might not the imperfection be? Why not at the bottom of the ocean, and caused by some injury to the cable? Fortunately, the imperfect portion was discovered to be on board the ship, and within sixty miles of the lower end, which was at once cut out from the coil, and removed from the circuit. Perfect insulation again appeared, and the current run through the whole length, from vessel to vessel, with undiminished force. Nothing further of an adverse nature occurred on board the Niagara. She pursued her course, and on the morning of the sixth day, Mr. Field discovered the headlands of Trinity Bay. What a load of anxiety was lifted from his mind when the welcome sight of land appeared! How was that sense of relief heightened to gratitude and joy, when, as he feasted his eyesight on the shores of America, he received a signal from the Agamemnon that they too had made the land! The deed was accomplished; the electric spark traversed from continent; science had proved a true guide; nature had been propitious; and He who holds in his hand the destinies of nations, had looked with favor on the enterprise! Well might the prayer of gratitude ascend from the deck of the Niagara, as her company knelt around the commander, and heart and voice united in the service.

A SUSPICIOUS RABBIT.

A gentleman, relating the incidents of his travels while in Paris, says: "I entered a restaurant on the other side of the Seine, and ordered a rabbit. I was green, verdant as the first cucumber, even as early peas, or I should not have done thus. The rabbit came, and I offered the Moniteur to an old Frenchman opposite, whose eyes were fixed upon my plate, but he bowed a negative. The bow puzzled me; it was too much. 'Monsieur has not been long in Paris?' 'No; I have just arrived.' 'Monsieur is going to eat that?' 'Yes; may I offer you a slice?' 'Monsieur will you allow me to make a small suggestion?' inquired the Frenchman, with a frightful grimace. 'Certainly,' I replied, becoming alarmed. "Monsieur that rabbit once mewed," he replied, with the utmost gravity."

QUESTION AND ANSWER.—What weapon does a young lady resemble whose acquaintances pass her in silence and without notice. A cutlass.

STRANGE NICKNAMES.—It is odd that we should nickname a foolish fellow a Solomon! a blustering, bullying fellow a Hector! and a Jew Moses! as in contempt.

THE EGG CROW.—The value of the eggs laid in this country annually, at eight cents a dozen, is $121,666,666. "Tell Chapman to crow!"

A WORD TO THE WISE.—Never contradict a woman. It is not only ungentlemanly, but altogether useless.

A NEW SLEEPING CAR.

The Michigan Central Railroad Company are now engaged in placing upon their track those most desirable of all railroad appendages, sleeping cars. Rejecting the devices of foreign inventors, they have adopted the conception of one of their own mechanics, Mr. S. C. Case, Superintendent of Car Works, which is one of the most simple and convenient arrangements of the kind that has yet been perfected. By a very quick and easy method the two seats occupied during the day are at once converted into soft cushioned beds for the use of three persons. A curtain then falls over the whole compartment, forming a family room, which with the windows raised for the admission of air, is all that can be desired. The great advantage of this invention is, that it can be adapted to the common cars now in use upon the road, which was not the case with the Woodruff patent. Cars which require refitting are thus made available by entirely changing their internal arrangements, at a cost probably not exceeding that required in the common mode of fitting. Those who travel much by railroad will fully appreciate the efforts of this model road in thus placing within their reach all the comforts of life. Four of these cars will be placed upon the track in a short time. They will be furnished with a regular attendant, to provide for the wants of travellers. Water-closets, wash-rooms, etc., are also attached.

POETICAL JUSTICE.—A cow which attacked women and children picking berries in a pasture at Templeton made a misstep while chasing them down a steep hill, and broke two of her legs. Perhaps it wouldn't have happened if the cow hadn't had a couple of horns when she started.

ACTIONS AND WORDS.—Actions speak more forcibly than words; they are the test of character. Like fruit upon the tree, they show the nature of the man; while motives, like the sap, are hidden from our view.

DELICATE ALLUSION.—An exchange, commenting on the fact that a number of Cincinnati young ladies have lately been married away to other places, says no city has a better claim to supply spare ribs for the universe.

ARISTOCRACY.—In Providence there is a lady so aristocratic that she refuses to take a newspaper because it is made of rags.

AN AGED LADY.—Isabel Gomez died in Havana on the eleventh of July, aged 102 years, and in the full possession of her faculties.

THE THERMOMETER.

This useful little instrument for measuring heat, is getting to be a very common article of daily use. We see it suspended in the dwelling-house, the office, the shop, and the church; and few are willing to pass the faithful little monitor by, without asking the question which it stands ready at all times to answer. The glass tube of quicksilver, with its enlarged bulb at one end, forms the most important part of the machine. It has to be prepared with much care and skill, in order that it may be useful. Every particle of air must be exhausted, and kept out, or the instrument will not tell the truth. The simple principle which lays at the foundation of the theory of its construction, is, that quicksilver, or mercury, will freely expand by heat and contract by cold, in a definite ratio. But air expands and contracts by heat and cold, in a much greater ratio than mercury, and therefore it must be shut out entirely from the tube—otherwise its action would utterly derange the regularity of the mercury's expansion. Mercury is selected for the liquid for thermometers for two reasons: In the first place, it does not freeze except in an intense cold, nor boil until exposed to a white heat; and thus has the greatest range between the freezing and boiling points of any liquid that is known. In the second place, the relations between mercury and glass are such, that the rate of increase of expansion, caused by increase of temperature, is the same in both; thus causing the increased capacity of the glass bulb to absorb the surplus expansion of the mercury, and make the portion in the tube move through exactly equal spaces at all changes of temperature.

For a perfect thermometer, it is necessary that the bore of the tube should be perfectly uniform; for if it were smaller in some places than in others, the same quantity of mercury would measure unequal lengths in different parts of the tube. The tube is prepared by closing one end and blowing a bulb thereon. The bulb and tube are then completely filled with boiled mercury, by atmospheric pressure from without, and expelling the air from within by heat. When this filling is completed, the tube is set aside to cool, with the bulb down. When it has completely cooled, it is then heated to the degree which it is designed to measure—usually that of boiling water; and while thus heated, the open end of the tube is closed by melting it with a blow-pipe, and in that way made air-tight. When the instrument then cools to the ordinary temperature of the atmosphere, the mercury of course contracts and sinks, and there remains a space in the upper part of the stem which is entirely empty—in fact, a perfect vacuum. This is the ordinary state of the tube, when in use. The next step is to graduate it for use by exposing the bulb to the contact of melting ice. The mercury in the tube falls to a certain point, owing to the contraction caused by the cold. This is carefully marked, as the freezing point of water. The tube is then immersed in boiling water, and the heat thereof causes the mercury to expand and rise in the stem. The point to which it rises is carefully marked, as the point at which water boils. We have now a standard interval upon the tube, designating the range of the mercury between freezing and boiling water; and this interval may be divided into any number of equal parts, called degrees, which will measure any temperature between the two extremes of freezing and boiling water. To measure greater degrees of cold, it is only necessary to lay off the portion of the tube which is below the freezing point into like equal parts; and for greater degrees of heat than boiling water, the portion of the tube above the boiling point is laid off in the same manner. The degrees of a thermometer are usually marked on a metallic scale, to which the tube is attached—the freezing point on the scale corresponding to the mark on the tube.

The thermometer in common use in this country, is called the Fahrenheit thermometer, after its inventor. In this instrument, the standard interval between freezing and boiling water, as ascertained by the experiment above described, is divided into one hundred and eighty equal parts, each of which is called a degree. The freezing point of water is marked on the scale 32° , and the boiling point, being one hundred and eighty higher, is consequently marked 212° . The zero point, on this scale, is the point to which the mercury sinks when exposed to a freezing mixture of salt and snow, which Fahrenheit erroneously supposed to be a state of absolute cold, in which bodies had no heat at all. He consequently called that 0, and started from it in making his scale. Subsequent observations and experiments have shown that a much greater degree of cold is possible, than that produced by the salt mixture; and therefore there is no good reason for placing the zero point where Fahrenheit has done. In practice, however, it works just as well; and as people in England and in this country have long been accustomed to this scale, the relative proportions of heat and cold are very readily ascertained by it. The ranges of temperature, which are observable by a Fahrenheit mercurial thermometer, are from 39° below 0 to 630° above. Mercury freezes at 40° below, and boils at 660° above; but the vapor thrown off makes its indications unexact above 630°. The thermometers in common use do not usually range above "water boils," or 212°, or below "mercury freezes," or 40° below zero.

The most convenient thermometer, and the one usually employed by scientific persons, is that which is common in France, Germany, and the north of Europe. It is called the centigrade thermometer, from the circumstance of the standard interval of the mercury column being divided into one hundred equal parts, instead of one hundred and eighty, as in the case of Fahrenheit's. Each degree of the centigrade is therefore equal to one and eight-tenths of the latter. But there is another, and a more important difference between the two, which makes the chief merit of the former; and that is, that the zero point of the centigrade thermometer starts at freezing water, instead of thirty-two degrees below, as in Fahrenheit's. The point of boiling water is consequently 100°, on this scale. Thus our ideas of heat and cold are by this instrument rendered more definite, by adopting for a starting point a common and entirely constant circumstance, like that of the congelation of water. The wish has often been expressed by scientific men, both in this country and in England, that the Fahrenheit scale might be laid aside, and the centigrade adopted in its stead, for the sake of greater simplicity and uniformity in observations.

The greatest cold that has ever been produced, artificially, is 135 degrees below zero of Fahrenheit—and this by the sudden conversion of a liquid into a vapor at ordinary temperature. The question arises, how this intense cold could be accurately measured, since mercury freezes at a temperature ninety-five degrees above that point? The answer to this question introduces another kind of thermometer, viz., the alcohol, by which alone could such an extreme degree of cold be measured. Pure alcohol is the only liquid which has never been frozen; and for this reason, it is employed in the thermometer, where great degrees of cold are to be measured. But though useful for indicating low temperatures, it is comparatively useless for measuring higher, as it boils at 174 degrees of Fahrenheit, and vaporizes at a few degrees higher. For higher degrees of heat than that at which mercury boils, still another instrument is used, which is called a pyrometer. The principle of its action is the expansion of iron in heating, and by it the temperature at which the various metals and other hard substances melt, has been ascertained. Thus, silver has been found to melt at 1873 degrees of Fahrenheit, and cast iron at 2786 degrees.

A THOUGHT FOR PARENTS.

A New York daily inquires and replies: "Who are our aristocrats? Twenty years ago, this one made candles, that one sold cheese and butter, another butchered, a fourth thrived on a distillery, another was contractor on canals, others were merchants and mechanics. They are acquainted with both ends of society, as their children will be after them—though it will not do to say so out loud. For often you shall find that these toiling worms hatch butterflies—and they live about a year. Death brings a division of property, and it brings new financiers; the old gent is discharged, the young gent takes his revenues, and begins to travel—towards poverty, which he reaches before death, or his children do, if he does not. So that, in fact, though there is a sort of moneyed race, it is not hereditary; it is accessible to all; three good seasons of cotton will send a generation of men up—a score of years will bring them all down, and send their children to labor. The father grubs and grows rich, the children strut and spend the money; they inherit the price, and go to shiftless poverty; next, their children, reinvigorated by fresh plebeian blood, come up again."

THE USE OF A MAGNET.—A smith, in Brighton, England, while forging a piece of iron, felt something strike his eye, and subsequently feeling great pain, he went to Dr. King, in Palace Street, who discovered that a piece of iron had embedded itself in the ball of the eye. After vainly endeavoring to extract it in the usual way, Dr. King thought of a powerful magnet which he had. He applied it to the eye, and was rejoiced to find the piece of iron instantly removed. It was as large as a grain weight.

EFFECTS OF THE FLOOD.—Some wag, writing from Cairo, Ill., since the subsiding of the flood, says there are now in that city four hundred and fifty-two distinct and different smells, and several wards yet to hear from.

A GREAT QUESTION.—Trelawney says Byron never smoked. Byron speaks in one of his letters of "twirling his moustache and smoking." It is therefore a question of veracity.

CRINOLINE AND MATRIMONY.—As flounces increase in number and become greater in size, wives diminish and lessen.

AN IMPOSSIBILITY.—For the Kentucky giant-ess, eight feet high, to marry above her.

A HENGAL PRINCE.

A correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser says he has just returned from a visit to the palaces and grounds of the Rajah of Bushwan. The estate of this petty prince, a fine-looking fellow, thirty-eight years old, gives an annual income of about four millions of dollars, over $450 an hour. His residence is on an estate of seventy-five acres of gardens and parks, which is interspersed with a number of large tanks one of them being a full mile around its four sides, with many stone stairways leading down to the water. The stud of the Rajah contains eight hundred of the best horses that can be procured in India, and he has besides about thirty fine elephants in his stables. He owns, in addition to his immense country estate, bazaars and considerable property in Calcutta. Twelve thousand men are employed on all his lands, four thousand in the immediate vicinity of his palaces. The monthly expenditure for the support of all this is only about $4000, and the native labor is the cheapest part of it.

FATAL FUN.

In Princeton, Ohio, Daniel Elliott, a respectable butcher, after dinner went to his slaughter house to clean it out. While there he was plaguing the children, and placing the rope with which he hoisted beeves around his neck, told a boy to turn the windlass and hoist him up a short distance, at the same time telling his daughter to go and tell her mother that he was going to hang himself. When the child told her mother what he had said, she paid no attention to it, as he was in the habit of plaguing her and the children, being a very lively person and fond of sport. But it appears that the little boy turned the windlass too far, and the rope suddenly slipping, caused a large iron hook which was fastened to the rope, to sink into the back part of his neck, and he was suddenly strangled. He carried his fun too far and lost his life.

SPIRITUALISM.—According to the Spiritual Register, the number of persons professing spiritualism, or kindred doctrines, on the American continent, is upwards of a million.

FAILURES IN LIFE.—Half the failures in life arise from pulling in one's horse as he is leaping.

THE COOLEST YET.—Telling a friend, who is melting with heat in the dog-days, to keep cool.

A LUCKY ESCAPE.

One fine day during the reign of his gracious majesty George III., a tar-ry breeched British man-o'-wars-man essayed, by dint of an unseemly missile in the shape of a paving stone, to crush the cranium, or, in the culprit's phrase, to "crack the cocoanut," of a certain nobleman or other distinguished dignitary of the realm, whose name is not distinctly remembered. But it occurred in London, near Eastcheap, on Easterday, and either Lord North, Sir Benjamin West or Doctor South was the proposed victim. At any rate, from all points of the compass, the usual congratulatory cataracts and avalanches were showered upon the fortunate pate which the villanous pebble did not happen to hit. Some envious epigrammatist of the time—possibly the assailant himself—adding insult to injury, perpetrated this cruel additional fling upon the occasion:

"Talk no more of the 'lucky escape' of the head
From a flint so unluckily thrown;
I think very different from thousands indeed,—
'Twas a lucky escape for the stone."

WORTH THINKING OF.—Many of our readers and subscribers have quite a collection of magazines, sheet music, pamphlets, and the like, lying about their rooms in the most unavailable form. Now to double their value, to preserve them, and to make them convenient for use and ornamental to your apartments, you have only to place them together, send to our office by express, or hand them in personally, and they will be bound up in any desired style, at the lowest rates, and returned to you in one week. A valuable collection of books is accumulated in a little while by this means at an extremely trifling cost.

JUVENILE SIMPLICITY.—A little girl was told to spell ferment, and give its meaning, with a sentence in which it was used. The following was literally her answer, "F-e-r-m-e-n-t, a verb, signifying to work; I love to ferment in the garden."

SHAKESPEARE ON HOOPS.—Prospero tells Caliban that his mother, "the foul wench Sycorax," with age and envy, "was grown into a hoop." It is to be hoped that no such accident as this will occur to the present generation.

EAST INDIAN ATROCITIES.—The Nana Sahib has been blowing prisoners from cannons lately, showing the British that two can play at that game.

THE QUESTION.—If a fender costs six dollars, what will a ton of coal come to?

Foreign Miscellany.

The cost of building the railways in Great Britain nearly equalled half the national debt.

Italy, the land of poetry and song, is the most extensive dealer in pork.

There are 13,000 blind women in Great Britain without remunerative work.

A lawyer in Sweden has been condemned to a month's imprisonment for undertaking an unjust cause.

At Paris, just now, they are all mad about Russian baths, which are said to cure gout, rheumatism and debility.

A work by Martin Luther, never before translated into English, has just appeared in London. It is called "The Creation: A Commentary on the First Five Chapters of the Book of Genesis."

The ordinary expenses of the French government have increased as follows: They were in 1847, 1,431,774,014*f.*; in 1848, 1,597,000,000*f.*; in 1857, 1,645,000,000*f.*; in 1858, 1,736,000,000*f.*

A large number of blood horses have recently been imported into Australia and sold at high prices. One horse, called Bolardo, half-brother to Imperieuse, brought $6750.

A grand banquet has been given in Galway to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in celebration of the establishment of a transatlantic line of steamers from the port of Galway.

A wealthy Venetian has just left £24,000 in trust to Count Cavour for public instruction in Piedmont. He was one of the many Italians who look upon Piedmont as the main instrument in the future liberation of Italy.

The Judges of the English Court of Common Pleas have decided that railway travellers are not bound to take care of any portion of their baggage, the company being legally responsible for its safety.

The French government has authorized the purchase for France of all the Spanish school paintings still composing the Soult gallery, and though many first-class works were sold by the old marshal during his life, the remnant is now bought for 500,000 francs.

A manufacturer in the south of France advertises a preparation which he calls "Eau de Noblesse," and declares that it makes the hair always preserve an "honorable" direction, and gives to the person who uses it an "air of distinction and supremacy."

The amount contributed to all the missionary and benevolent societies in Great Britain last year, was about one million pounds, or five millions of dollars. The amount expended in the same time in intoxicating drinks was seventy million pounds, or three hundred and fifty millions of dollars!

The Isle of Wight papers mention that a robin has built her nest inside the organ of Arreton Church, in the island, and is rearing this year's second brood there. It appears that after rearing the first brood, she built her nest in a pew in the church, but it was torn down just as it was completed, and then the poor bird returned to the organ.

The cholera has broken out at St. Petersburg, and Paris just now is very unhealthy.

The waters of the Seine, at Paris, are in nearly as bad a state as those of the Thames.

London is to be encircled with telegraph wires from the house-tops, in the style of Paris.

Madame Champagneaux, only daughter of the celebrated Madame Roland, recently died in Paris.

The number of churches in Great Britain is 14,000, while the number of dissenting chapels is 20,000.

The Emperor of France has proposed that the debts of M. de Lamartine should be paid by the nation.

A Paris letter says there is scarcely a French lady, even of very moderate fortune, who does not possess one or more India shawls.

A monument to Madame Sontag has been erected at Marienthal, near Dresden, by the Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz.

Miss Louisa Pyne has been appointed to the office of soprano singer of the Foundling Chapel, London.

John Gordon, the richest commoner in Scotland, died on the 16th ult. He was worth about $15,000,000.

Two firework manufactories in London exploded on the 12th ult., injuring about two hundred persons, some fatally.

Small satirical journals are rapidly on the increase at St. Petersburg, twenty-one of them being at present published there.

An accomplished, beautiful, and wealthy young Englishwoman—Miss E. Southall—has fallen in love with, and recently married Juan Fernandez, a celebrated bull-fighter at Madrid.

Napoleon III. has presented to the Church of St. Thomas, Canada, through the Rev. Mr. Trachon, a valuable dessert service of silver, inclosed in a splendid case with the Imperial arms, accompanied by a letter.

A subscription has been opened in Piedmont to raise a statue to Silvio Pellico, the well known victim of the Austrian carcere duro at Spitzberg, in his native town, Saluzzo. It is headed by Count Cavour.

The new rifles for the French infantry carry the shot a distance of six hundred metres, while the old rifles only reached four hundred metres. The bullets are oval, and hollow inside, and open on the base, which is filled with gunpowder.

According to the Italian papers, the people are returning to their ancient love for Rossini's music. At Rome the Sieve of Corinth is now the operatic rage, whilst at Florence and Genoa Guillaume Tell and Moise are being performed with the utmost enthusiasm.

The crew of a French ship, Marie Caroline, were lately murdered, and the ship burnt, on the coast of Madagascar. It appears that she came to the island to take free laborers for the French colonies, which one of the Madagascar chiefs promised to supply. When the captain came on shore to receive them, he was treacherously murdered.

Record of the Times.

The Massachusetts Arms Company, of Chicopee Falls, make about $100,000 worth yearly.

Before the 8th of Nov., 127 members of the U. S. House of Representatives are to be elected.

A log has been found in New Jersey composed of three kinds of wood—oak, maple and hickory.

There are 100 artesian wells in Iroquois Co., Ill. The average depth is about 120 feet.

Among the marriages reported in Cincinnati lately was a Mr. Moon to Miss Shine.

100,000 barrels of lager beer, of 32 gallons each, are manufactured in Philadelphia yearly.

The poetess, Mrs. Estella Ann Lewis, has obtained a decree of divorce from her husband.

Fitz Greene Halleck says Campbell is his favorite among all the English poets.

In Illinois, two years' absence causes divorce. Among out-door exercises for ladies we are pleased to see the old sport of archery revived.

A man is in no danger, so long as he talks his love; writing it, impales him on his own pot-hooks.

Judge Yerger, of Vicksburg, Mississippi, has decided that a policy of life insurance is not subject to attachment, either in law or equity, to satisfy the claims of creditors.

The Minnesota Assembly have passed a law fixing the rate of interest at fifteen per cent. per annum on money. It is thought the Senate will stick for eighteen per cent.

Cincinnati is now the largest horse market in the United States, and during one week, lately, forty thousand dollars worth of horses were sold at the various stables.

The Masonic fraternity of Louisville have erected a building that has cost from $130,000 to $150,000. It has been built almost entirely at the expense of the members of the fraternity.

The Indianapolis Journal says a young woman in that city committed suicide by taking strychnine, giving as a reason that she had been in better circumstances and could not bear to be working in the kitchen for a living.

The number of distinct species of insects already known and described cannot be estimated at less than two hundred thousand—there being nearly twenty thousand beetles alone, now known, and every day is adding to the catalogue.

In the city of New York, since the first of June, no less than 4489 dogs have been received at the dog-pound, and destroyed by drowning, except a few that were reclaimed by their owners. Fifty cents is allowed for each dog.

An island, about five rods square, covered with a luxuriant vegetation, floated down Lake Ontario a few days since. The soil was sufficiently firm to bear up a man, and was inhabited by small birds.

California is one of the most extraordinary instances of rapid growth, probably, ever known. Emigration commenced in May, 1848. At that time, it contained hardly 15,000 inhabitants. There are now 600,000, showing that in ten years it has increased forty fold.

A boy in Watertown, N. Y., smothered an infant he had charge of, because it cried.

The Utah mail party lately encountered in their journey millions of buffaloes.

A young lady of 17 married a man of 75 in Kansas, because she liked his speeches.

Property in San Francisco has declined twenty-five per cent. within a short time.

While a detective officer was asleep in the Chicago cars a light fingered rogue stole his boots.

A letter from New Brunswick, Texas, says that the government camels are increasing in numbers, and that the young camels are thrifty.

Dover, the capital of Delaware, contains 1140 inhabitants, and increases at the rate of about 100 souls annually.

J. W. Davis, of Holyoke, Mass., caught an eel, a few days since, in which was found a gold ring worth four or five dollars.

Two hundred thousand pounds of women's hair is annually sold in France. The price paid for it is usually six cents an ounce.

One hundred thousand roses are required to give a yield of one hundred and eighty-eight grains of attar or oil of roses.

The present valuation of Bangor, Maine, is: resident real estate $3,606,061; personal estate $1,966,058; non-resident real estate $441,590; total, $6,013,709.

In order to prevent extravagance in dress, the Trustees of the Newberry (S. C.) College have instituted a system requiring all the students to wear a uniform dress.

When Mr. Stevenson was asked by a railway committee whether he could make a railway under the Alps, he replied, "Under the Halps, mon! Why, yes, I could make a tunnel under the world, if ye liked—it's merely a question of pounds, shillings and pence."

The annual receipts of Yale College are stated to be $55,704 21; expenditures $55,351 86. The average amount spent in New Haven by those connected with the College, can hardly be less than $400, so that the College yearly disburses some $300,000 among the citizens of that town.

The Bombay Geographical Society announce in their proceedings that they have received a specimen of the walking leaf from Java, with eggs and young; and, what seems more curious still, a walking flower, described as a creature with a white body, pink spots and crimson border.

The other day a clerk in a store at Wheeling, Va., discovered, in a coffee sack, a note of the denomination of $1000 on the Royal Bank of Brazil, a piece of silver coin, and twelve gold pieces of Brazilian coinage. The treasure had evidently been placed in the coffee sack for safe keeping. The lucky clerk fobs the plunder.

It is not more than twenty years ago since the tinder-box was in universal use. It is abolished now. The invention of the friction match spread slowly, but who, at this day, would venture to say they could do without it. Insignificant as matches appear to be, single factories, with extensive machinery, cut up large rafts of timber annually for them.

Merry-Making.

It's the last ostrich feather that breaks the husband's back.

Rats and conquerors must expect no mercy in misfortune.

The man who was filled with emotion, hadn't room for his dinner.

Beware of the gaming table—you can't always "nick."

What fishes have their eyes nearest together? The smallest.

When is the weather favorable to hay-makers? When it "rains pitchforks."

"Can you return my love, dearest Julia?" "Certainly, sir. I don't want it, I'm sure."

When you go to drown yourself, put off your clothes; they may fit your wife's second husband.

If petticoat government is not more oppressive now than formerly, it is certainly double in extent.

A man can no more believe with another man's faith, than he can satisfy his hunger by seeing another man eat.

Washing shirts, says an exchange paper, wears them out. When they get dirty, rub them over with chalk. "Economy is wealth."

When you hear the phrase, "I may say without vanity," you may be sure some characteristic vanity will follow in the same breath.

It can hardly be said of a man when he is hung that he pays the debt of nature; it is altogether likely that he goes into a state of suspension.

Every rose has its thorn. We never helped to shawl the flower of a ball-room without being convinced, by painful evidence, that she had a pin about her.

"Come, Bob, how much have you cleared by your speculations?" said a friend to his companion. "Cleared?" answered Bob. "Why, I've cleared my pockets!"

"Jack, I think your father is going to flay you and make leather of your skin." "Why so?" "Because I heard him say that he would tan your hide well for you."

When is a door more than a door? When it is to (two). Why is the medical profession the most tedious? Because it requires more patience (patients) than any other.

Julius Caesar Hannibal, giving an account of his sea-voyage, says: "All de passengers was now heavin', and as if dat wasn't enough, de captain give orders for de ship to heave too, and she hove too."

"I would do anything to gratify you; I would go to the end of the world to please you," said a fervent lover to the object of his affections. "Well, sir, go there, and stay, and I shall be pleased."

A lawyer in one of the Western courts lately threw a cane at the head of another. The court required him to apologize for it. He did so, and added: "While I am about it, I may as well apologize beforehand for throwing another cane at him the first chance I get."

When is a boat like a knife? When it is a cutter.

What is that which is invisible, but never out of sight? Letter I.

Why is a dandy like a haunch of venison? He is a bit of a buck.

What kin is that child to its father who is not its father's own son? His daughter.

When is the letter α like one of the United States? When it is in Diana (Indiana).

Why is a nail, fast in the wall, like an old man? Because it is in firm.

What word is that to which if you add a syllable, it will make it shorter? Short.

How can five persons divide five eggs, so that each man shall receive one, and still one remain in the dish? One takes the dish with the egg.

"What did you give for that horse, neighbor?" "My note." "Well, that was cheap enough."

The Woburn Budget thinks there has been considerable "wire-pulling" lately between England and the United States.

A man ceases to be a "good fellow" the moment he refuses to do precisely what other people wish him to do.

Here is a piquant extract: "He kissed her, and promised. Such beautiful lips! Man's usual fate—he was lost upon the coral reefs."

To a friend who had married a lady who was on the point of taking the veil, Jerrold said: "Ah, she evidently thought you better than nun!"

"It is a curious fact," says some entomologist, "that it is only the female musquito that torments us." A bachelor says it is not at all curious.

A young man stepped into a bookstore and said he wanted to get a "Young Man's Companion." "Well, sir," said the bookseller, "here's my daughter."

A few days since, a Missouri sheriff, after making a legal return to a writ, added: "I think it right for me to mention that there is no such person as John Doe in the State."

A man hearing of another who was a hundred years old, said contemptuously: "Pshaw! what a fuss about nothing! Why, if my grandfather was alive, he would now be a hundred and fifty years old."

A soldier found an inscription on a tomb in antique letters of bronze. He detached the letters one by one, and, carrying them in a bag to an antiquary, threw them down before him, asking the meaning of the inscription.

An aurist was so remarkably clever that, having exercised his skill on a very deaf lady, who had been hitherto insensible to the nearest and loudest noises, she had the happiness, next day, of hearing from her husband in California.

GIVEN AWAY.

Any person desiring to see a copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, the favorite illustrated weekly journal, has only to address us a line to that effect and a copy will be sent by return of mail, full of elegant engravings, free of charge. M. M. BALLOU, Boston, Mass.

Sketches from our Humorous Gallery.

A Horsepital.

"Would you mind, sir, obliging me by playing that delightful instrument opposite the magistrate's, only three doors off!"

Entering the Mouth of the Thames.

Two Pinks of the Fashion in New York

You must come along with me to the cage

A Quilldriver—driven to pen-ury.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

"What's that hare?"

The thing's boddly impossible!

Tongue-tied.

A moving tale.

He's under the thumb of his mother-in-law.

"What a time they are opening the door!"

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. VIII.—No. 5. BOSTON, NOVEMBER, 1858.

WHOLE No. 47.

THE MACKEREL CRUISE, WITH A CURSORY GLANCE AT THE COD FISHERY.

To the accompanying illustrations, drawn expressly for us, we add an explanatory text, the materials for which, as well as the sketches, were the result of a trip undertaken the past summer for health and recreation. Every summer the mackerel fishermen of Gloucester and fishing ports of lesser note, send out their tidy, trim built vessels to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Bay de Chaleur. The fleet is mostly composed of fore-and-aft schooners, varying from 60 to 120 tons. They are fitted out by their owners, and provisioned for a ten or twelve weeks' cruise. The small craft carry from six to ten hands; the larger ones from ten to twenty. The men are shipped on shares with the owners—consequently each individual is interested in the well doing of his vessel. The captain, or skipper, as he is called, is usually part owner, and spares no pains to make the voyage not only profitable but also pleasant.

MACKEREL JIG, FULL SIZE.

We left New York July 4th, and started for Gloucester, the largest fishing mart in the United States, where we were so fortunate as to procure a passage in one of the fastest sailers of the fleet, the "Republic, owned by parties in Gloucester, and commanded by Capt. George Friend, of the same place.

After a mackerel season, many of these little vessels outride the winter on the Western and George's Banks, returning into port occasionally to discharge their cargoes of cod and halibut. Subject to much violence from the heavy northeast storms, they become badly damaged in both hull and rigging, making it necessary to overhaul and completely repair previous to the departure for the fishing grounds in the spring.

The "Republic" was in this dilapidated condition when we stepped on board of her; therefore, we will begin at the beginning, and open the record of the adventure with the first important business—washing decks and discharging ballast, in order that the schooner may be beached for painting. The schooner is represented in this condition in the engraving on page 415. She is floated broadside to the shore, and is left at low water high and dry upon her beam ends. A coat of thin verdigris is then applied to the sides and bottom below the water line, to prevent any injury to timber by the destructive sea-worm; after, which, the hull, masts, decks, etc., are painted to suit the fancy of the skipper.

It was a glorious summer morning, wind and tide favorable, when our saucy little schooner, with her crew of sixteen hands, left the harbor of Gloucester for the town of Liverpool, Nova Scotia, our first stopping-place, where we dropped anchor early on the afternoon of Saturday, after an extraordinary passage of fifty-one hours. The picture of the schooner under way gives a correct idea of her appearance. Our object of changed, and the vessel headed for Pirate's Cove, a romantic harbor midway in the Gut of Canso, where we arrived in good time, and remained a few hours to obtain wood and water. On Thursday the wind, which had been favorable, suddenly left us becalmed in the Bay of St. George the visit accomplished, the following day, with a spanking breeze, we were again on our course, making Cape Canso—the easternmost land of Nova Scotia, distant about four hundred miles from Cape Ann—on the afternoon of the following Tuesday. Leaving this point, our way was (this interesting incident is depicted in our second engraving) when active preparations were at once made for moulding jigs, setting knives, reeling lines, etc., each man striving to excel his shipmate in mechanical ingenuity. Jig-moulding, especially, is one of the fisherman's delig' ts,

DEAD CALM IN THE BAY OF ST. GEORGE.

THE SCHOONER UNDER WAY.

and is entered into with great zest by all hands. They are formed of the best quality of hooks of different sizes cast into sinkers of block tin and pewter. Our first sketch delineates correctly the "mackerel jig." After all necessary appurtenances for catching the fish are completed, the right rail of the schooner is divided, according to the number of men, into what are called berths, or stands for fishing. The best of them are then sold by the skipper to the highest bidder. One of our engravings shows the amusing scene of the auction. This proceeding is always productive of the greatest excitement. Fun and frolic are now the order of the day; and rare jokes are perpetrated, and original sells are conceived for the benefit of each impatient bidder, making the scene one of uncommon interest. Thirty, fifty, and even sixty dollars premium is often paid for the "high line position." Barrels of bait are now drawn from the hold and ground by a machine for the purpose into requisite portions for feeding. This is done from troughs securely fastened to the fore and main rigging. Bait is constantly thrown to entice the mackerel to the surface of the water. They rise in vast schools, and are fed continually while about the vessel. Saturday morning, with a light breeze came the order to set sail, the island of Bonaventure, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, our destination, where we "hove to" for our first chance among the numerous schools of fish surrounding us. When the vessel is well off her course, jibs down, and sails motionless, each individual takes his place at the rail, and with a line in either hand, waits patiently for the mackerel to rise. Soon a tinker is seen to dart swiftly up the schooner's side, and over the shoulder of the "high-line man." Another, and another follows it, the sight of which makes the little pale lad at the bait-box half frantic with joy. And now they come! Hurrah! how fast from the bubbling water!—all hands, from the weather-beaten skipper to the green hand aft, joining with wild delight in this most exciting sport. One of our illustrations depicts this exciting scene. The fisherman holds a line in each hand, but uses both to draw the fish, which is thrown over the right shoulder, and dropped into the barrel behind. A crack fisherman never moves from his position, only using his arms; and can endure three days' fishing without fatigue, though they sometimes drop asleep. Fishermen when busy stand the entire day at the rail, and salt nights.

In active times, it is not unusual to fish and salt three or four successive days. Success, however, does not always follow the mackerel catcher. A lucky man may return home with his vessel in a fortnight, and discharge a capital load of three or four hundred barrels; while his neighbor skipper that sailed out with him, may dodge about from place to place, till he is forced back by wintry storms, with only fifty. Nevertheless, among the unlucky ones there's a deal of contentment; for 'tis all play with Jack when tinkers are scarce. You will find him, on such occasions, either spinning out the toughest yarns, or dancing till he is black in the face, some good old-fashioned reel. Then there's the lark ashore, and the breakdown with the village girls; the political discussion with the Britishers; and last, but not least, the "red-eye frolic," ending in broken heads and aching limbs.

One of our illustrations exhibits the crew of the mackerel schooner dancing for dear life, and enjoying themselves as men only can with whom recreation is an infrequent episode of a laborious life. We have also shown an incident in the cruise in the sketch of a squall, by way of contrast to the "dead calm" previously delineated. No vessel can outride a storm better than these fishermen. They haul down flying jib only, and "let her slide" into ten and twelve knots. These squalls are very common in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, blowing almost every day when the wind is off shore.

Another of our views represents Arch Island. This extraordinary rock rises abruptly from the sea to the height of 288 feet, and is a third of a mile in length. It is uninhabited by man, but myriads of wild birds build their nests, covering the entire surface, which is as white as if capped with snow. The singular arch at the southwestern extremity was formed by the action of the tides, and can only be approached in calm weather. Six miles distant, Mont Perce, or Table Roulante, is seen towering 1250 feet above the town of Perce at its base, and visible distinctly forty miles from the ocean, a prominent and conspicuous landmark.

In another sketch we have depicted the operation of splitting mackerel. The splitter takes the fish in his left hand, and draws the knife down through the back from head to tail. An expert hand can split sixty fish in a minute. Another hand immediately cleans the fish, and a third salts and packs them in the barrel. Each hand marks and sorts his own catch.

This series of views will give our readers a correct idea of the details of a business which employs a vast amount of capital and tonnage, and involves the labor of a perfect army of men. The mackerel belongs to the family of Scomberoides. That found upon our coast is the Scomber vernalis (spring Mackerel of Mitchell). Dr. Storer says that Mitchell describes under the name of "grex" and "vernalis" the common mackerel of our coast. Cuvier, although he admits both in his great work, considers them as the same; and Richardson remarks, the "only difference between scomber grex and vernalis seems to be in their size and color, and they are very probably different ages of the same species." In the specimens brought to Boston market, Dr. Storer found the difference between the two too slight to constitute distinct species.

Perhaps no branch of human labor is subject to greater hardship and peril than the fisheries. The men engaged are schooled by their avocation to habits of endurance and privation which bring out in full development every internal source of strength and nerve; and it is a wonder, that when their remuneration is often so slight, and their returns so precarious, there can be found so many willing to undergo the toils and dangers of a life which has so few of the elements of romance about it.

From six to eight thousand barrels of fresh mackerel are sold annually in Boston market alone; but "their great value to this people arises from the means of employment afforded to an immense number, by the process of salting and packing." We believe the fishery of a sum-

THE SCHOONER IN A SQUALL.

SALE OF BERTHS.

'gle year in Massachusetts alone, has amounted in value to a million and a half of dollars. The number of barrels of mackerel inspected during a period of five years, in this State, was 1,079,116. As we have remarked before, the luck of the fishermen is very variable. "In some years," says Storer, "immense shoals of these fishes are readily met with, and the vessels return in a few weeks with full cargoes; while the same localities may be visited in other seasons, and the efforts of the fishermen prove fruitless and his fare meagre. So peculiar are the habits of this genus, that oftentimes weeks may pass, and the fishing smacks be surrounded by millions sporting upon the surface of the ocean, and scarce one allow itself to be taken; while again, the success of a few days will retrieve the disappointments of nearly a season. Thus, a fisherman informs us, that last season, having been in the Bay of Chaleur, and taken but few fish, the vessel to which he belonged was returning home, when, off Cape Cod, the fish were so numerous and voracious that the crew, consisting of ten men, captured in two hours nearly thirty barrels. At this time about two hundred smacks were together, and they were all equally successful, some of them taking even forty barrels of fish. * * Several of the most intelligent fishermen inform me that the difficulty of taking mackerel is yearly increasing, from the barbarous custom of gaffing them, of collecting them around vessels by means of throwing out bait, and then suddenly drawing up an instrument armed with numerous sharp iron points, by which many are captured, and greater numbers are cruelly maimed without being taken."

The European mackerel was early known as an article of food, and was held in high esteem by the ancient Romans, as forming the celebrated sarum—a pickle or sauce—of which they made great use. This was prepared from several different kinds of fishes, but that from the mackerel was deemed by far the best. The generic character of the scomber are "scales on the body small and smooth; vertical fins not bearing scales; two dorsal fins widely separated; some of the posterior rays of the second dorsal and the anal fin free, forming filets; sides of the tail slightly carinated; one row of small conical teeth in each jaw, the parts of the gill cover without denticulations or spines; seven branchiostegous rays."

The delicate colors of this fish, shading from black on the head, and dark green on the back, to silvery white with reflections on the sides, make it a perfect picture. It is certainly one of the nicest table fishes we have, and when broiled by a skilful hand, fresh from the water, forms a dish that a hungry man can relish without much coaxing of the appetite. The mackerel, salted and cured, forms a staple of export and consumption perhaps second to no other fish—a branch of business too well known to be discussed in this connection. A mackerel cruise, as an episode in one's life, is a pleasant thing to look back upon; while a life devoted to the business is one of severe toil, and not unfrequently attended with great danger.

While engaged on our mackerel cruise, we picked up some interesting facts in relation to the cod-fisheries of the French, which, we trust, will prove an acceptable appendix to the foregoing sketches.

The fisheries are the schools which have furnished the best sailors to the respective nations engaged in them. In the midst of tempests, and on stormy seas, the young mariner receives his first professional baptism; in this school of danger and privation his strength and intelligence are exercised. In all times the maritime powers have found the elements of their prosperity in the fisheries. Venice and Holland, the two republics which, in times past, threw so great a weight in the balance of nations, started with nets on their shoulders and began their career in fishing-smacks.

These nations of mariners soon became rich and strong, and their preponderance on the sea ensured them the commerce of the world. The maritime power of France was also swelled by the fisheries: her squadrons were formed only at the period when the fishermen could unite in large fleets; this was in the commencement of the 16th century, when the Portuguese Corte Real, which had observed the extraordinary affluence of cod upon the great bank of Newfoundland, pointed out this inexhaustible mine to the European fishermen; and Francis I. caused these resorts to be explored by Jacques Cartier, of St. Malo, the best sailor of his time. Still, at first, no great profit was derived from the resources which chance had discovered in these latitudes. John Cabot, the Venetian, sent by Henry VII. of England in search of a supposed northwest passage to China, recognized, in 1497, an island which he called Prima-Vista, and which maritime nations, envying by turns the possession of this new country, translated each into its own language.

In 1501, Juan Ayamonte, a Catalan sailor, received a license from the queen of Spain to make explorations in the Tierra Nueva (para ir a saber el secreto de la Tierra Nueva), and he was recommended to take with him two Breton pilots. The English named it Newfoundland, and they did not think of colonizing it till a hundred years afterwards. The charters granted by Henry VIII. for founding fisheries there, at first produced no result, and the English marine only acquired sure preponderance in those seas after the celebrated Drake had driven out the Spaniards. Their taking possession of Newfoundland only dates really from 1585; the island only reckoned sixty-two colonists in 1612, and the number of fishing vessels hardly reached fifty. The French only commenced the fishing business seriously in 1540. The permanent establishments they founded on the shore did not meet with the success anticipated at first; and it was only under the reign of Henry IV. that the minister Sully favored the cod-fishery to the extent of his power by placing it under the protection of the government. Hence this business, which the French now follow on the high sea at more than six hundred leagues' distance from their country, which for more than three hundred years has employed so many hands and supported so many people, at first only moved very slowly. It required State bounties and aid to raise it to commercial rank. Then the fishing-stations on the shores and banks of Newfoundland attracted the fishermen of different nations. France and England, who for a long time disputed the possession of the island and adjacent waters, ended by fixing the different limits in which fishermen might pursue their business under the sanction of treaties.

ALL HANDS FISHING.

Before 1713, the French fisheries supplied the wants of almost all Europe, and sufficed for the supply of the French vessels; but the treaty of Utrecht, that of Versailles (1783), and the cession of Canada, changed their situation. They lost successively all the rich establishments they had formed at a distance, and which had raised the fisheries to the highest degree of prosperity. The colonies of Acadia and Canada, Isle Royale, Isle Saint John, and Newfoundland, passed from the hands of the French. Reduced now to confined limits, without the power of establishing any dwelling, but only scaffolds and huts, to dry fish; possessing only, for shelter, the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon—bare and wretched rocks, which they are obliged to supply with the necessities of life—the French vessels are obliged to sail annually from the ports of France. Yet, notwithstanding this state of things, and thanks to the encouragement of the government, the French fishermen have struggled bravely to compete with those of England, established and domiciled on the southern part of Newfoundland, and, with those of this country, enjoying all the advantages of proximity.

The cod-fishery occupies annually more than 400 French vessels, which, with those employed in accessory labors, make a fleet of 600 sail, manned by 13,000 seamen, or about a quarter of the effective personnel of the maritime enrolment—a valuable reserve, always disposable, and hardened by the roughest labor on a stormy sea and in a rigorous climate; a reserve useful for commercial navigation in time of peace, and indispensable, though inadequate to the manning of the fleets, in time of war. The produce of the French cod-fisheries is estimated at about 370,000 quintals of fish, of which about 135,000 are exported to the colonies, Italy, and Spain, and the remainder absorbed in home consumption.

The fishery on the coast of Newfoundland has always been placed in the first rank; it is that which occupies the greatest number of seamen. Vessels of all sizes are employed in it, from 30 to 350 tons. When the vessel arrives on the coast, about the first part of June, it is dismantled, and the crew goes ashore into one of the wooden huts, which always need repair after the winter. Thence boats, manned by two seamen and a green hand, are sent every morning to fish with the line, returning at evening. Independently of these "dories," every French vessel fits out one or more "seine battaux," manned by ten men each, who fish when the cod become more abundant. On the return of the boats the fish are split, salted, and piled. After remaining a few days, the green hands and boys dry them on piles of stones until they reach a degree of desiccation to permit their being housed. The fishermen leave the coast at the end of September to return to France—some of them to carry a cargo of fish to the Antilles.

The fishing at St. Pierre and Miquelon is similar to that on the coast of Newfoundland; it is carried on by means of flat-bottomed boats, like our John Dories, which they call warps, or in pirogues. These craft, to the number of 200 or 300, are propelled by sail and oar. They carry two men each, leave in the morning and return at evening. The different classes of people devoted to the taking or preparation of fish on the shores of these two little islands are divided into three categories—1. The stationary fishermen or colonists, numbering 1000 or 1100; 2. The hibernating fishermen, who pass the bad season, or establish themselves on shore for several years: their number, subject to variations, rarely exceeds 500 individuals; 3. The transient fishermen, who come from France and return at the end of the fishing season: there are about three or four hundred of them annually. The fishing and the preparation of cod, being the only business of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, occupy the whole of the hibernating fishermen, and almost all the stationary inhabitants, men and women, young and old, even from the tenderest age. The fishing begins in the month of April, and is continued to the middle of October; it is generally abundant enough, and yields small fish, like the coast of Newfoundland.

The fishing on the Grand Bank is effected by vessels of 120 and 130 tons, provided with two large boats each. Sixteen or twenty men are required to man a vessel and its boats. Their departure from France takes place from the first to the fifteenth of March. The vessels repair directly to St. Pierre, and there land the fishermen, boys, and green hands, who form the legal complement of their crews, and who are designed to do the work of drying on shore. Thence they set sail for the Bank, where they anchor. The two boats are set afloat; and every evening, manned with five men each, they throw out their lines with 4000 or 5000 hooks. The lines are hauled in every morning, and the fish, split, washed, and salted, are placed in the hold. The part of the crew who remain on board busy themselves with hand-line fishing. The first fishing finished, which takes place from the 15th to the 20th of June, the yield is taken to St. Pierre, to be dried there; while the vessel, furnished anew with salt and bait, returns to the Bank for a second fishing. Sometimes a third is made, the produce of which, only salted, is carried direct to France in a green state. The fishing on the Grand Bank is harder and more perilous than that of the coast; it requires thorough sailors and intrepid men; it is carried on upon a constantly agitated sea; and losses of men and boats are frequent in squalls and fogs. The shore fishing makes sailors—the Bank fishing hardens them.

As for the Iceland fisheries, they are carried on in a latitude of 64 or 66 degrees north, in the midst of floating icebergs, where there is no anchorage, and the sea is always rough. On the coast the fishing-vessel is stripped; in the Banks she rides at anchor; but in the high latitudes she is necessarily kept under sail. The fishing is by lines a hundred or more fathoms deep, and the fish is prepared and salted in tuns brought from France. The vessels range from 60 to 80 tons, manned by 12 or 15 men each. They sail in April and return in September. Some favored ed to form bold seamen, and none is marked by severer losses of men and vessels.

ARCH ISLAND, IN THE GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE.

The French are paying, like ourselves, particular attention to the sustenance of their fisheries. With them it is a productive business, is already the most important branch of their commercial navigation, and furnishes a fifth of its force to their mercantile and naval marine.

Regarded as a supply of food, a source of national industry and commercial wealth, or as a wonder of nature in its continuance and multiplication, the codfish may justly challenge the admiration of every intelligent observer. Though found in considerable numbers on the coasts of other northern regions, an extent of about 450 miles of ocean, leaving the chill and rugged shores of Newfoundland, is, as we have already stated, the favorite resort of this fish.

Few members of the animal creation contribute a greater mass of subsistence to the human race, still fewer are more universally serviceable, than the codfish, of which every part is applied to some useful purpose. When fresh, its beautifully white, firm, and flaky muscles furnish our table with one of the most delicious dainties; salted, dried, or otherwise conserved for future use, it affords a substantial and wholesome article of diet, for which a substitute could not readily be found. The tongue, which is always separated from the head when the fish is first caught, even epicures consider a delicacy; and tongues, salted or pickled along with the swimming-bladders, which are highly nutritious, being almost entirely pure gelatine, are held in much estimation by house-keepers, under the title of tongues and sounds. The sound or swimming-bladder of codfish, if rightly prepared, supplies an isinglass equal to the best Russian, and applicable to all the uses for which the imported is employed. The liver of the cod, when fresh, is eaten by many with satisfaction, but it is more generally reserved, by fishermen, for the sake of the large quantity of fine limpid oil which it contains. This is ones return home in June, and sail again directly on a second voyage. Thus some crews keep afloat for six months. No fishery is better adapt-extracted by heat and pressure, and forms the well-known cod-liver oil of commerce, which, in many respects, and for most uses, is superior to the commonly used fish-oil. The heads of cod-fish, after the tongues are cut out and the gills are saved for bait, are thrown overboard, on account of want of room, and because salting would not preserve them to any advantage. Yet the head, being almost entirely composed of gelatine, is, when fresh, the richest, and perhaps the most nutritive, part of the fish. The fishermen, it is true, make use of it for their own nourishment, but the great mass is thrown into the sea—a circumstance we cannot reflect upon without regret, when we remember how many poor, in various charitable institutions, and through the country generally, might be luxuriously fed with this waste. If vessels were provided with the requisite implements and fuel, these heads would furnish a large amount of strong and valuable fish-glue or isinglass, that would well repay the trouble and expense of its preparation. The intestines of the codfish also yield a tribute to the table; the French fishermen, especially, prepare from them a dish somewhat similar, and not far inferior, to the sounds. Finally, the ovaries or roes of the females are separated from their membranes, and the eggs, nicely pickled, afford an agreeable and gustful relish, far more delicate and inviting to the palate than the celebrated Russian caviare. In addition to these usual modes of employing the different parts of our fish, the Norwegians, Icelanders, and Kamtschadales pound up the backbones and other refuse parts, for the purpose of feeding their dogs and other domestic animals during the winter. Strange as such diet may appear, it is stated as a well-established fact, that cows, fed upon these pounded bones, mingled with a small quantity of vegetable matter, yield a larger supply and a better quality of milk than those supported upon more ordinary provender.

Returning from our cursory view of the cod-fishery as a branch of industry engaged in by the French, to the subject-matter of our article, the mackerel, we premise that our readers are probably aware that the mackerel is as abundant on the French and English coast as on our own. And, as with us, it is held as one of the most delicious table-fish. The mackerel fishery affords employment to numbers of French and English. The mackerel approaches the coast of England in large shoals, and it was formerly considered that its annual movements were from northern to southern, and from southern to northern, latitudes; but this fish is found in the British seas at all seasons of the year, though in winter they are not numerous. When the fishermen commence fishing early, they are obliged to proceed a considerable distance out to sea, approaching the coast as the season advances. The first catch of the season commands a very high price. There are three modes of fishing pursued in Europe—with drift-nets, with seines, and with the line. By the latter, a couple of men will take from five hundred to one thousand a day, if it be favorable. The fishermen prefer a smart breeze, which they call a "mackerel gale." The French boats go out frequently with six or eight people on board, all of whom fish with the line, some hands tending two lines. The fish bite voraciously; frequently a rag attached to the hook is sufficient bait. The seine fishing requires two boats. The drift-net fishing is thus described by Mr. Yarrell: "The drift-net is twenty feet deep by one hundred and twenty feet long, well corked at the top, but without lead at the bottom. They are made of small fine twine, which is tanned of a reddish-brown color, to preserve it from the action of the sea-water, and it is thereby rendered much more durable. The size of the mesh is about two inches and a half, or rather larger. Twelve, fifteen, and sometimes eighteen of these nets are attached lengthwise, by tying along a thick rope, called a drift-rope, and, at the ends of each net, to each other. When arranged for depositing in the sea, a large buoy attached to the end of the drift-rope is thrown overboard, the vessel is put before the wind, and, as she sails along, the rope with the nets thus attached is passed over the stern into the water till the whole of the nets are run out. The net thus deposited hangs suspended in the water perpendicularly twenty feet from the drift-rope, and extending from three-quarters of a mile to a mile, or even a mile and a half, depending on the number of nets belonging to the party or company engaged in fishing together. When the whole of the nets are thus handed out, the drift-rope is shifted from the stern to the bow of the vessel, and she rides by it as if at anchor. The benefit gained by the boats hanging at the end of the drift-rope is, that the net is kept strained in a straight line, which, without this pull upon it, would not be the case." The nets are set in the evening, and sometimes hauled once during the night; at others, allowed to remain in the water all night. The drift-rope is hauled in by means of a capstan. The boats employed are generally about thirty feet long, built of oak or ash, copper-fastened, with great depth of waist and breadth of beam, and are considered both fast and safe. The seasons of the mackerel fishery fluctuate greatly, an abundant being succeeded by an unproductive one; or, several plentiful seasons may occur together, and be followed by as many of scarcity. On some nights two or three thousand fish will be caught by one boat, and another, not more than a mile distant, may not take one hundred. This uncertainty contributes to render the fishery a precarious source of subsistence to those who can only embark capital in it on a small scale, and cannot stand against the unforeseen reverses which may occur in a short period, but are counterbalanced on an average of years.

SPLITTING THE MACKEREL.

THE CREW DANCING.

The study of fishes or ichthyology (from the Greek ichthys, a fish, and logos, a discourse or treatise) is not only very interesting but very important. Of all classes of vertebrate animals, there is not one which affords so great a number of species useful as food to man. Nor is the supply scanty: they are drawn by millions from the deep; the work of fisheries gives employment to thousands, and the amount of capital employed is enormous. The fisheries, we have observed, are an excellent school for seamen, and the best sailors and commanders in the mercantile and naval marine of this country have served an apprenticeship at the fishing business. Tenants of the waters of our globe, the organization of these animals expressly fits them for their liquid element. They are clothed neither with comotion in fishes, but these, in fact, are principally used as balancers of the body, as agents in turning the direction of the animal's course, or of guiding it as it swims along. It is the tail, or elongated muscular extremity of the fish, tipped with a broad extended web or fin, which constitutes the efficient organ of locomotion. The fish sculls itself along by rapid strokes from side to side, as may be seen by disturbing one of these animals while at rest and watching its motions. It is by the movements of the same organ, only more violently exerted, that the fish leaps out of the water, springs at insects, or clears the waterfall; and we may further observe that it is only in such fishes as have the tail muscular and pow-

THE SCHOONER BEACHED.

hair nor feathers, but with smooth scales, often beautifully bright and delicate, giving uniformity of service to a compact contour, admirably adapted for progress through the waters. Some, it is true, have a hard osseous envelope, like the Ostracans; and others are arranged in a panoply of spines, as the Tetraodons and Diodons, which remind us of the hedgehog. There are some, also, as the eel, the codfish, shark, etc., which have the skin naked, smooth, and slippery. As is the case with terrestrial animals, they vary in their habits and powers of locomotion. Some move slowly along, others cleave the waves with the velocity of an arrow, bear up the rapids and clear the falls with wonderful energy. Many persons regard the fins as the principal organs of loerful, and the body compactly shaped, that this faculty of leaping exists. The large-headed, slender-tailed codfish cannot leap, but the salmon and trout will spring several feet above the surface of the water. The use of the fins as balancers was proved by the experiments of Boullé, who observed that when both the ventral and pectoral fins of fishes were cut off, all their motions were unsteady, and they reeled from right to left, and down, in a very irregular manner. An internal sac, usually termed the swimming-bladder, a reservoir of air placed beneath the spine, and varying in form and size in different species, by the inhalation or expulsion of its contents, enables it to sink or rise. The sight of fishes is ordinarily very acute.

THE WITCH GLASS:

—OR,—

THE THREE SISTERS OF WOODAWAY.

BY MRS. M. A. DENISON.

WOODAWAY was an old chateau, built in the reign of some old king—I forget who. It was romantically situated, as most chateaux are, in the midst of a charming grove. It had been purchased by a man who had grown weary of the world and its hollow hearts. He had found a wife who was willing to court the charms of solitude, and both being rich they determined to forsake the enticements of society and, finding congenial companions, a few of them, live in a world of their own, independent of the wretches who often exist under the name of fashionable people. So they prevailed upon two very small and very charming families to take up their abode with them, and entered their new home one beautiful spring morning, while the birds were singing and the buds bursting into blooms.

The new old residence had been transformed into a charming place with the aid of upholsterers and all sorts of work-people. It was like all such antiques, full of elaborate passages, winding staircases, suites of charming little rooms, many large and oak panelled apartments, blue parlors and green parlors, and purple parlors, and voted by Monsieur Herman and his wife, and the two monsieurs and their wives who accompanied them to be in every particular "just the thing."

Nor was it wanting in beautiful gardens, fountains, whose white spray fell over groups of marble forms—hot-houses, conservatories and all the appliances of ease and elegance.

Years passed on, and three fresh, lovely young faces gathered around Monsieur Herman's knees. The families who entered the chateau with monsieur grew tired with the solitude and were gone.

"I am glad of it," said he, "they talked too much of the world outside and would have corrupted our little ones."

"They were not fitted for such a life," said the madame, "unless like us, they had had children to enliven their time."

"That is so; and here they come from the bath, little angels!"

It was true, they looked like little angels, that is they were extremely beautiful. Judicious training had developed them gloriously. They were accompanied by their bonne, a shrivelled, mahogany-colored, but good little Frenchwoman who had been in the family for seventy-five years.

And yet one could hardly tell which were the sprightliest, the children or she.

Louise was the golden haired. A true blonde beauty, her locks hung in rich ringlets below her waist. Her chest was round and as white as marble—her whole form harmoniously developed. There were dimples from her cheeks to her fingers. Her color was as the bloom of the brightest rose, her brow and her teeth, milk white; her lips pink and prettily pouting.

Lillias was brighter and darker than Louise. Her hair rippled in browner waves, there was a more decided contrast between her eyes and her complexion. But the dimples, the color, the animation and the sweet, quick smile were the same. Her stature was of the same height, though she was less in years by two.

But the darling of all was Jeannie, the sunbeam. She looked like both sisters, both parents. She was suggestive of laughing waters, red rosebuds, and dancing rays of light. They all idolized Jeannie, and there was a sweet competition which should do her the most favors.

This then was the household of Monsieur Herman. No pains were spared in the education of his lovely daughters. They had masters of the first eminence, all old, grave men, who were not slow to carry news of the extreme beauty of their young pupils, so that though they lived in strict seclusion, their fame rang through the land. Many a nobleman would have given half his fortune for a sight of the three lovely sisters of Woodaway.

At length when they were of the respective ages of thirteen, fifteen and seventeen, Herman took a pleasant journey to Paris, to call upon his old friends and note how time had fared with them. Previous to this, he caused Louise, who painted superbly to execute the miniatures of her sister and herself on ivory, and enclosing them in cases of gold and pearls, he set out upon his tour, smiling and talking to himself. The truth is, he had taken so much pains with the fair sisters, that he did not relish the remotest possibility that bad husbands could or might undo all he had done; so the chief object in this journey that he contemplated was to choose husbands for them. He was welcomed as one from the grave by the friends who had thought never to see him again. Most of them were more changed than he, and all of them had families who seemed to be a trouble and perplexity to them.

The young men in these families perhaps surmising the cause of his unusual presence, put themselves on their best behaviour that they might be invited to the chateau so near yet so remote.

Monsieur Herman had not lived and thought and studied in solitude for nothing. His mind had been so long freed from the gross control of conventional living, that it seemed to have grown purer, and intuitively able to detect the presence of gross vices, or deforming errors in all whom he met. Fine faces and manly forms there were in abundance. Young men of means—of titles and of family, were solicitous for an invitation to Woodaway. They little knew how easily he detected their selfish thoughts. How he learned that some were fonder of the gaming table than of their honor, others indulged in strong potations till they were senseless—others were vain, others quarrelsome, and many of them vapid, silly self-lovers. However, he invited them cordially, after a certain time, and trusted to the ingenuity of his daughters to find out their several traits of character.

He was one day dining with the Count Mourney. His son, a young man of twenty-two, sat opposite, in an enormous neck-tie. He was profuse in compliments to the guest; he had been favored with a sight of the miniatures.

"By-the-by," said Monsieur Herman, "I have heard nothing of my old friend, Sebastian Spiers."

"O, he is entirely ignored in polite society," said the young nobleman.

"So am I," returned Herman, with a graceful bow.

The young scion bit his lip. "It is you who have ignored society," he said, quickly.

"And what has my friend done, that he should be cut?" asked monsieur, politely.

"Bought him some acres out of the town," replied young Mourney, "and 'tis said that he and his three sons work the ground with their laborers."

"Ah! But Spiers was a very superior man."

"Yes, so considered, and his sons had nothing more to learn in the universities. They had the path of fortune opened to them, why should they be hum drums?"

"True," said monsieur, quietly, "true. Have they much fortune?"

"O, nothing; although they fancy they are rich men because they have health, strength, willing hands and active brains. Paugh! what notions!"

If the young scion had taken the trouble to look over his neck-tie, he could have seen an expression of contempt on the features of his host. But he was busy with his salad, which he boasted it took him always forty minutes to prepare.

"So! I must go and see friend Spiers," soliloquized Monsieur Herman. "It seems he was nearly of the same mind with myself; preferred the contempt of popinjays to the company of fools. He was my good friend; an honest, upright man. He had also a beautiful wife, a superior woman. I admired her much before I saw my own wife."

So he had a fine horse saddled, and away he rode to S., a great old town, very ancient and of very few inhabitants. It was in the autumn of the year. As he passed by a thriving field of corn, he called to a poor man who was repairing the fence, and asked whose field it was.

"M. Spiers, your honor," replied the man, with French politeness, stopping to uncover his head.

"And that noble orchard yonder—the trees run as straight as the lines of parallel, and the apples look like drops of gold."

"M. Spiers, your honor," again reiterated the man.

"This M. Spiers has great possessions, I should think," said Monsieur Herman.

"He's a great man, your honor," replied the laborer, and resumed his work.

Half a mile further on, monsieur's path was intercepted by gaily painted wagons that were being driven into an overloaded orchard, from the trees of which men were taking bushels of bright red apples. Never were more thrifty limbs, richer, ruddier looking fruit.

A young man seeing him pause, gathered some of the best of the fruit and brought it to him in a small basket. He was a splendid specimen of a farmer. His garb, though suited to his occupation, was not coarse—his linen was white—there was an air of superiority about him.

"Young man," said Herman, "you look like M. Spiers."

"It is not remarkable," said the young man, smiling, "since I am his son."

"His son, indeed? Your father was my oldest and best friend. He married three years before I was born. I was at his wedding. My name is Herman. Have you heard him mention me?"

"Yes," said the son, his handsome face beaming. "Will you ride to the farmhouse, where my mother will be proud to welcome you, or shall I call my father, who is in yonder group of apple-sorters?"

"Call my friend to me by all means, if he can be spared," said Herman.

M. Spiers was soon by the side of his old acquaintance. He did not look much older than his eldest son of three-and-twenty, as he stood there. Joyful congratulations over, M. Herman was conducted to the farm house, which was located in a situation combining all the beauties of a rural landscape. It fronted on a river; it was surrounded by gardens. It seemed to Herman as if he had returned again to his beloved chateau: The mother also astonished him; she looked still so blooming, so beautiful!

"It is our charming country air and occupation," she replied, when he expressed his astonishment.

The guest was taken all over the noble farm. Every where it gave token of the taste and industry of its possessor. "I have nearly cleared it," said he, with an honest pride; "I am almost a rich man. On these three pleasant sites I shall build houses for my sons. Then when they marry they shall bring their wives here, and we will together make a happy family."

"Your sons have wives in prospect, I suppose," said Monsieur Herman, with a shade of anxiety in his tone.

"O, no; they have been too busy building nests for them. That is my only trouble. Suppose they should bring hither worldly, fashionable women. I should no longer be contented."

"My dear friend! I make no propositions—but look at my treasures;" and out came the three miniatures.

"Charming! heavenly! what truth and purity of expression!" exclaimed M. Spiers.

"Yes, my friend, I have endeavored to keep them pure, and my only anxiety is respecting their future partners. Money is no object to me; it is their happiness I seek—the happiness of their children."

M. Spiers smiled thoughtfully. "You and I always adopted odd notions," he said, seizing the hand of his friend. "How strange that we should be in circumstances so similar. I have three children, so have you; they have been brought up for each other. Let us go in to dinner."

At dinner there was much of the etiquette of city life. They had not abolished the refinement of certain customs and habits. The father and his sons appeared costumed like gentlemen; the mother in a courtly dress, presided. Servants in abundance waited. The meal was excellent, and the silver massive.

The three sons were all nobly handsome; the youngest only nineteen. They saw the miniatures and were enraptured. "Leave them," said M. Spiers, "and take those of my sons instead. Then we shall have mutual remembrances of each other."

This was agreed upon. An eminent artist was called in, and the work well and delicately done. The three handsome heads on ivory went to Woodaway, snugly ensconced in Monsieur Herman's pockets.

His family was delighted to see him again, and listened with rapt attention to his description of the places and persons he had seen. He told the blushing girls to prepare for visitors, at the same time handing them a list of names of young men, with some queer items of his own attached. The next morning they each found the miniature of a handsome young man upon her table. They compared faces, but each liked her own the best, and wondered why they should receive so strange, yet so acceptable a gift. Preparations, meantime, went bravely on. Dressmakers had feasted their curious eyes and hungry ears, and gone home to empty out budgets full of wonder.

One day, Louise said gravely to her sisters, "I have thought of a plan for dismissing our admirers without words, and also to punish them for their sins."

"What is it?" cried both sisters, eagerly.

"Come with me," replied Louise.

She led them to the centre of the house where was an oval room, very dim, because lighted but by a few windows from the hall, and which was used only of evenings.

In the centre stood an immense mirror, placed in a highly elaborated frame, and from the ceiling hung a canopy of laces, thus making a reflection somewhat obscure.

"Do what you see me do," said Louise, and forthwith she began removing the quicksilver with a little scraper.

"O, Louise!" cried Lillias, in consternation, "you are ruining the glass!"

"The glass is mine," returned Louise, gravely, "papa gave it me, and approves my plan; so scrape away."

"But cannot some of the servants do this?" queried little Jeannie, shaking her amber-colored locks from her brow. "I can see no earthly use in such work."

"You will see," replied Louise, with dignity.

"I would not have the servants know for the world. This plan must be a secret between us and our dear parents. There! it is finished. Now Lillias, get your tambour frame, and work a coiled serpent with its head protruding. Make the body full, cover it with gold thread, and put in two emeralds for eyes. It must be so natural as to hiss, almost."

Lillias was open-eyed with wonder, but nothing suited her better. And she went to work.

"You, Jeannie," said Louise, "where is our poor old pet, Minnette, that papa had stuffed."

"In one of the rooms up stairs," said the little Jeannie, looking with all her eyes.

"Well, you are ingenious. Go measure him and make him a Parisian suit, with a frilled shirt, a high collar, and I will see that his boots are ordered."

"Louise, are you beside yourself?" and Jeanne threw back her head, while a musical peal of laughter rang from her pretty throat.

"I am not in the habit of being beside myself," said Louise. "You should do as I wish, when I have both papa and mama's sanction. Besides, you will have much fun in robing poor old Minnette."

"Truly so I shall," laughed the young girl. "I'll give him a scarlet coat and plum colored breeches. He shall have a chapeau equal to De Lise's best. I'll put a feather in it. And his ruffle! O, his ruffle!" repeated the little beauty, clapping her hands, "I'll make it stand out so far. He shall have a superb collar, reaching to his ears like those of papa's valet. I will go and find materials immediately." And away ran the pet, skipping, dancing, full of glee, to drag down the poor old stuffed ape.

Meanwhile, Louise was busy in her studio, mixing colors, laying them on, and painting on huge sheets of Bristol board. Only now and then she allowed her parents to judge of her work; they invariably came out from the studio smiling.

At length there arrived three young men at the chateau, ostensibly to hunt, fish and enjoy the season. Really to make good their claims to the possession of the three fair daughters. When they spoke of this object at the close of their visit, Monsieur Harman made reply: "I like your personal appearance well enough—my daughters must decide for themselves. But before you ask them, I must tell you of an ordeal which all claimants for their love must pass. In this, as in most old houses, there is a peculiar, I will not say a haunted chamber. In that chamber is a mirror which has the strange power of reflecting the most prominent moral trait of the individual who looks therein. If this mirror shows you your own faces clearly and fairly, you, Sir Bertrand, may sue for the love of Louise, whom you confess you admire—you, and you, may do the same to each of my other daughters. But if you see aught else but your faces, you must never speak to them of love."

Bertrand, the son of Count Mournay, smiled between his neck-tie and his eye-brows. "I am willing to try the test," said he.

"Very well," said Monsieur Herman.

On the first announcement of their visit, the girls had consulted their list.

"We must give them a lesson, sisters," said

Louise, "for see what my father says of them." And she read:

Bertrand Mournay—son of a count—insufferably vain—a brainless exquisite.

Eugene De Lasne—wedded to cards. Already a gamester of repute, though of a great family, and rich.

Edmund Lascelle—stinging in speech, subtle in motive, and sarcastic in manner.

"Now," she exclaimed, "you shall see what I am going to do." With their help she completed a background of a brilliant tint, and placing the stuffed monkey, arrayed in his gaudy habiliments, behind the glass, she arranged the curtains to an appropriate focus, and bade them look within.

It was a laughable sight to see master Jocko sitting up in all the pomp of scarlet and gold, grinning horribly at the spectators, and the girls enjoyed it thoroughly, laughing to their heart's content and half pitying the poor victim of their sport.

But he anticipated unmixed triumph. The fair Louise, had she not smiled upon him? Was not his father a count? Did he not inherit vast wealth? Would any girl spurn a home in a castle—a coronet—a fortune? And all these, with his incomparable self, he was willing to lay at her feet. True, he felt a little uneasy at the first—but monsieur was an odd man—he always had been an odd man, and had perhaps arraigned in that peculiar chamber his daughters wedded gifts—or some unlooked-for surprise.

Therefore, with his valet following to see that no accident befell him, he strutted to the chamber. A very quiet, subdued light fell within. He marched boldly towards the mirror—paused—drew the curtain, and stood transfixed with surprise, mortification, indignation. Worse than all—his valet had seen. There was a suppressed smile on that worthy's face as he turned around. The young noble saw it, and—kicked him for it; then with blazing cheeks and stately tread, without once waiting to smooth his neck-tie or pull up his collar, away he trod—down the stairs—out of the house, and calling for his horse, he rode from Woodaway forever.

The next victim, as he drew the curtain, saw a purpled, fiendish face, with cards in both hands—a sneering, leering countenance that displayed all the bad passions of the gamester. Furious at the vision, he flew down the stairs and made an assault upon the monsieur. He was quietly helped out of the chateau, and putting spurs to his horse, and venting curses, he hurried from the place.

The third was the most quiet and cat-like of the whole. He stole up by stealth, and seeing the fangs of the serpent, the cold glitter of its green eyes, he crept away as quietly as he entered, and making as if he had seen nothing, politely informed his host that he would save himself the fatigue of mounting to the oval room; he would mount his horse instead, and bid him a very good morning.

Monsieur, however, knew what he had seen, and so did his daughters.

Again and again these symbols, with many others, were brought into requisition. Some of these visitors went away furious, others thoughtful. Every vice for which they were distinguished, Louise, who was a genius, had placed upon canvass in a delicate way, and, strange as it may seem, it had the effect to reform several young blades, who had never before been placed where they could "see themselves as others see 'em."

Meanwhile, the young girls had not been idle over their miniatures. Jeannie, child as she was, put hers under her pillow every night, that she might see that beautiful smile the first thing when she awoke, she said. The other sisters valued theirs in the same ratio.

So with the young M. Spiers. They had every day grown more charmed with the lovely counterfeits of the beautiful sisters.

"I am sure I love her, she is so innocent," said the youngest, pressing the delicate ivory to his lips.

"She is an angel of beauty!" remarked the eldest, gazing with rapture upon the pictured lineaments of Louise.

"And mine is not a whit less lovely," ejaculated the second brother, placing it carefully next his heart.

But the tidings of the oval room had somehow leaked out. "The Hermans had a witch-mirror that would cause their daughters to die old maids," they said; "for who is perfect?"

The three brothers felt perhaps a little nervous at this news, but being willing to risk something for the sight of these beauties, they concluded to go, especially as M. Spiers, their father, encouraged them, saying: "Doubtless they have been waiting for you, and have kept other lovers at bay."

News of their coming set the sisters in a flutter of delight.

"I hope mine will be the handsomest," said the wild little Jeannie.

"They are all handsome," said Louise, looking at her miniature as if she thought one at least excelled the others.

"But sister," said Lillias, "what shall be done to the mirror? Remember there is no back to it. They cannot see themselves."

"True," replied Louise, "but we will arrange that when they come."

The next day the brothers arrived. In their hearts the sisters said that none of all the rich and noble young men appeared as handsome or as distinguished as these. There was an air of superiority about them which possibly they had acquired by a thorough intimacy with nature. And then their pure habits and lofty morality combined to render them remarkable. Madame Herman was in extacies with them. "If her children might be so happy as to get such husbands," she said, "she could leave the world with less regret when her time came."

But the trial of the oval chamber remained to be repeated.

"Perhaps," suggested Monsieur Herman, "they had better all go together, and station themselves before the glass. It was wide enough—a stately old mirror." So they entered the room, supported by each other, smiling, yet fearing. The curtain was drawn. The brothers stood, startled, delighted, and silent. There, opposite the eldest, was Louise, blushing beautifully, holding up to view, as in a mirror, his own likeness. Next stood Lillias in the same posture, opposite the second brother, and the third beheld tele-a-tete the mirthful, dimpled Jeannie, half ready to explode with laughter, whose little hand was exhibiting the same sign of recognition and acceptance.

It was very French—that is, very tasteful and beautiful. A mutual pleasure was the result, and the fine old chateau resounded with their twain voices for many a day after. The old folks were satisfied that the refined simplicity of their children would not be outraged, and the children themselves—O, they were charmingly suited—of course!

According to their ages they were married, Jeannie waiting two years. If anybody travelling in that part of France, will take the pains to find Woodaway, somebody will tell him of the witch-glass in the oval chamber. Or, if he will go in a different direction, to the monster-farm of the rich M. Spiers, he will see the different families, old and young, living together in the most perfect harmony.

WOMAN.

Yet was there light around her brow,
A holiness in those dark eyes,
Which showed—though wandering earthward now—
Her spirit's home was in the skies.
Yes—for a spirit, pure as hers,
Is always pure, even while it errs;
As sunshine, broken in the rill,
Though turned astray, is sunshine still.—MOONS.

THE SISTERS.

BY BEATRICE.

They were through their young lives
To difference won;
Their souls blent no sweet ties—
Sorrow hath made them one!

Nourished by the same care,
Sheltered by the same vine,—
O mournful thought! that there
No soul-rays shine!

Ye missed the spring-time mirth,
The gush of song,
Borne by the dewy airs
And scents along!

Childhood all sunless passed,
Youth with a deepened frown,
Years, as they gathered fast,
Sank with more coldness down.

Till grief with a mighty stroke
Struck a slumbering thrill,
And a kindred feeling woke,
Time might not still.

With the bowed head and heart
Came burning thought,
And playing the penitent's part,
It a union lasting wrought.

Sing the triumphal strain
To hearts once lone,
They are gathering joy from pain—
Sorrow hath made them one!

GUILFORD EIGHTY YEARS SINCE.

A TALE OF THE GREEN MOUNTAINS.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

"It will not do to let things go on in this way; now mark my words. What it is best to do with these meddlesome, factious fellows, I will leave others to say. I don't like to have all the talk to myself."

The speaker straightened himself up, as with a feeling of intense self-denial. An old, wiry looking farmer, with a bilious face, made a step forward, eagerly raising his forefinger to seize more vividly the attention of the listeners.

"The squire has said jest right, only he hasn't said enough. Now as far as I see, the only way to stop the trouble with these cantankerous sort of people, is jest to root 'em right out, stem and branch. That's the way. There isn't more than one or two at the bottom of all this mischief, and we must send them packing right off. Give 'em orders to start by to-morrow arternoon, and if they don't do it, jest turn out and help 'em. That's what I say. Get old Burrill and one or two others out of the way, and we shall be able to get along. That plaguy Burrill—"

The farmer stopped suddenly, as he noticed the approach of a young man, apparently from twenty to twenty-five years of age, well made, and rather quiet in demeanor and expression. The party under the tavern windows eyed him with no very inviting glances, and one of them accosted him with an ironical air.

"Look here, now, Burrill, we've heard that Allen has given either you or the old man a governor's commission. Now, let's know how 'tis, can't you? Hope you won't be hard on us."

"I have not heard anything of the kind," replied young Burrill, calmly.

"What a beautiful young man! Such a nice, harmless temper," said another, cheered on by the approving grins of his friends. "I dare say now, if any one were to kick him, he would be willing to overlook it—wouldn't even think of resenting it."

Burrill did not appear to notice these jibes, but passed on into the house. His retreat was watched by his ill wishers with unmitigated contempt and scorn.

"Would any one suppose," exclaimed one, "that any Green Mountain lad could have so little spirit as that fellow has got? You can't quarrel with him anyhow. Whatever you are a mind to say or do, he'll put up with it. I could bear him, and the old man too, better, if it wasn't for their sneaking way. Confound all white livered chaps, I say!"

"You mustn't be too severe, Caudrey," said the young lawyer. "You know that all men haven't the pluck that you have. I wouldn't like to have either old Burrill or his son really harmed; though, as to whether they don't deserve it enough, I won't say."

"There, now, Squire Danby, it isn't any use to talk," answered Caudrey. "Them Burrills, old and young, are mean, sneaking, under-handed chaps, and you know it as well as I do."

The squire's countenance indicated that he felt the complete truth of the accusation, and he made no rejoinder. His manner, however, quite as effectually declared his opinion, both to his companions, and to one who was by chance a witness of their discourse. Fair Lucy Carroll sat at an open window above the conversants, and her ears, not altogether unwillingly, drank in the purport of their discourse. Yes, she had even glanced through the vines which wound upward, and had marked the bearing of young Burrill and his antagonists. A slight expression of scorn mantled on her lips:

"I had thought him possessed of more spirit," she said to herself.

"Halloo ! Lucy !" cried the voice of her father, from below. "Come down, gal ; here's young Burrill wants to see you a moment."

Lucy hurried down to the large, old-fashioned parlor, and entering it, found John Burrill standing hat in hand. He bowed with an embarrassment which was not altogether displeasing.

"Miss Carroll," he said, "I heard you some time since, wishing for some slips of the Lancashire rose. I was so lucky as to procure some the other day, and would offer them to you if you are not already supplied."

The unfavorable impression vanished from Lucy's mind at this mark of attention.

"Thank you," she answered. "I should be very glad indeed to have them. But why do you not sit down?"

"No, I must be going ;" and the young man hesitated again ; his fingers nervously clutched the rim of his coarse hat, and he turned half away.

"Miss Carroll, I wish to say—there are hard feelings, as you well know, between our folk and your own, and others also. It is not for myself, —but what I would like to say is, that a word from you would be likely to influence your father and others to peace more than anything we can do ; and—"

"How do you do to-day, Miss Lucy?" interrupted young Squire Danby, making his appearance at the open door. "Ah, Mr. Burrill ! how d'ye do?"

Burrill took no heed of this forced recognition, but with a constrained bow bade Lucy good morning. His adieu was received with cold civility. His face burning red, he hurried away.

"What a fool I have made of myself," he murmured half aloud. "What a dolt I am that I could not speak plainly what I meant, and no more. I dare say Miss Lucy thinks I am a cowardly —. Sdeath ! I won't think of it ! But it's for the old folks, yes, for my old father and mother—for them I will hold my peace."

As he walked along with clenched fingers and lowered eyes, a hand was laid not lightly on his shoulder.

"Look here, lad," exclaimed old Carroll, for it was the tavern-keeper himself who spoke, "I was never the man to use my neighbors ill, and I wish to treat everybody decently ; but just see here. As near as I know, you and the old man, and a few more, are contriving and plotting with old Allen's gang to get the whole town, property and all, into your own hands. Now, I want to be right out, square and above-board—no sneaking for me. If you have a mind to do what is right, I'd be glad to see you here any time ; else, I hope you'll never step foot in my house again."

John, in his abstraction of mind, had not heard the first part of this speech, but the latter part struck home to his soul in letters of fire. He dashed away the landlord's hand with a sudden fierceness.

"Spare your words, Luke Carroll," he cried. "Neither my father nor I will ever care to cross your doorstep again."

The landlord gazed after him open-mouthed, too much astounded at first, to feel the anger which soon rose within him.

"Dang it!" he exclaimed, his stout chest heaving with the heat which flushed all over his broad, round face. "To be snapped up in that way by a boy like Jack Burrill, a white-faced boy, that has hardly had spunk enough to show his face, except among friends. He and the old man, plotting and working underhandedly as they have done. And he to snap me up so, when I only wished him to speak honestly and frankly. Gad ! but I'm glad it has come to this ; I'll see that he doesn't go sneaking round my Lucy any more, I rather think."

Hearing a step behind, Carroll checked himself.

"How are you, Ben?" he said, at sight of the young lawyer—"or squire, I spose I ought to call you, since you take that name now. But I'm no great hand for titles. By the way, (his face grew hot again) here has that jackanapes, young Burrill, just left me in a way that had I been a few years younger, would have bred a worse humor than I am in now. D'ye see, I thought to have a word or two with him about these difficulties that we have had of late, in my plain, blunt way, meaning no harm, when Master John cuts me short in such an insulting way, and with such a look. Gad, sir ! if I had been a little younger and hotter blooded, I believe I should have knocked him down on the spot."

"Had you been a younger man," replied the squire, very slowly, "he might not have spoken as he did."

"That's the truth !" exclaimed the landlord, with an emphatic shake of his huge fist. "For the life of me, I can't see how a young fellow like him can show so little spunk as he generally does. With me, it used to be a word and a blow, and then I was more ready to make up than ever. But these cold-blooded boys — foh ! I can't abide 'em."

"You are right, my dear sir," replied the young lawyer, with earnestness. "Youth is the season of generous, outspoken impulse. It is no season for slow, selfish calculation and underhanded plotting. For my part, I am sorry to see that John Burrill has so much of his father's slow, crafty temper about him. Anything like meanness in one of his age, so disgusts me. Why, it was but just now that I happened to overhear him saying to your daughter—but no, on second thought it would hardly be the thing to mention it."

"Speak out!" exclaimed Carroll, testily, seizing him at the same time by the arm. "Speak out, man—what are you afraid of?"

"Why, merely this," replied Danby; "it might have a look as if I had been playing the spy—but you know me too well for that. It's but a trifle after all, and I ought not to have spoken of it."

"What are you so backward about, if it's such a trifle?" cried the landlord. "Out with it, if you don't want to put me in a passion. If you don't speak, I'll have the girl tell me it at once."

"It was merely this, sir," replied the other, still affecting much reluctance. "I was lounging along, in my careless way, towards your parlor, scarce thinking there could be any one there. As I came along, the door was a little way open, and I stopped a second or two, taking a look at that picture of the capture of Louisburg. Just then, I heard John Burrill talking to your daughter within the room, and what he was saying so surprised me, that it held me fast for a moment or two. But as soon as I came to myself, of course, not wishing to overhear what was not designed for my ears, I walked straight in. To be short about it, he was attempting to wheedle Miss Lucy, asking her in so many words to coax you over to his interest, and that of the old miser his father. I declare, sir, that I was so disgusted at his sneaking meanness, that it almost choked me. I do not know but it was well that he took himself off at once, or I might have said what I ought not."

"Miserable fellow!" exclaimed the exasperated host; "if I only had him within my grasp, I could shake him limb from limb. Now Ben, or squire, I should say, I want to ask you if we are bound to suffer such nuisances amongst us, as these Burrills and their abettors? You are a man of the law, and ought to know something about justice and the law. Now, what is your opinion about this?"

"My opinion, sir, is very clear on that point; and had I been an older man, I should have felt really obliged to speak it ere this, and most distinctly, too. According to the law of the land, we are, as you well know, living under the jurisdiction of the State of New York, under which jurisdiction, also, you and the other magistrates hold office. But the Burrills and their abettors totally deny the authority of the laws, and of course, the authority of the magistrates also. They deny that New York can convey lands or claims. To come to the point, just as soon as Ethan Allen and his myrmidons can spare their strength from elsewhere, just so soon we are to be overawed, and cowed down by their presence. And it will be the most we can hope for, if we be allowed to remain quietly where we are, by yielding up half of our possessions."

"By all that's great!" cried Carroll, striking his massive palm upon his thigh, "we'll not remain quiet—not we. Look here, Ben; here is a letter from New York, which I have had about me these two days, without saying a word to any one before yourself—without knowing indeed, whether to act on it at all. But now look at it, and judge for yourself. Tell me what you think of it."

After some rummaging in his pockets, he had produced the missive, which he now placed in Danby's hands. The latter glanced it over, repeating now and then a few words and conning the rest in silence.

"State of New York, and so forth; to Luke Carroll, and so forth, magistrates. Whereas we have positive information that Paul Burrill and John Burrill, the son of said Paul, together with certain associates herein named, to wit, and so forth, we do command that you do hereby remove the aforesaid Burrills (and such of their associates as you may think proper) forthwith from your limits. Also, that in the name of the government of New York, you warn them beyond the boundaries claimed by and for said State. Allowing only such previous notice before actual removal, as you may deem absolutely necessary. Signed, and so forth."

"My dear sir," continued Danby, turning to his elder with an expostulatory air, "I can appreciate your feelings in thus hesitating to execute this mandate; but it does seem to me that you are unwise in prolonging the hesitation. Letting alone your duty towards obeying the authorities over us, can you justify longer delay in removing from our midst these—what shall I call them? Pests is a hard word—rather I will say, these continual obstacles to the prosperity and happiness of our town. It is—it must be, grievous to your kindness of heart, but there is no alternative; they must be removed. Give them the warning; give them all proper assistance in their disposition of property. Yes, and although they have no legal titles to their farms, no doubt men will be found to take them at as decent prices as can be expected in these times. There are the Burrills, for instance, whose lands join some of ours. My father and I stand ready now, if they desire it, to take up the farm at a reasonable compensation."

"You are a good-hearted youth, and a knowing one," said Carroll, decidedly. "What you have said touches the point exactly. There's no other way. They must go, and that as soon as possible. We must give them notice to-night. And, as your father is one of us, I want you to mention this to him immediately."

The squire turned homeward across the green Guilford Common. No thought of the nature around him; no sense of the pure mountain air laden with blessings to body and mind. His heart was on enmity intent.

"No, I could hardly have managed it better;" so he deliberated with himself. "It would hardly do to be over eager at first. That would, very likely, spoil the whole. And Lucy is so ridiculously sentimental at odd times, that I dare not, if it were only on her account, push things faster. I think I have got the leading hand just now on that young boor, but I have thought sometime that the girl had more than half an inclination towards him. Confound you, John Burrill! Let me but once get you fairly under foot, and then—I!"

He set his boot-heel on a bit of soft moss which lay in his path, and, twisting and writhing his foot, ground the velvety substance into atoms scarce distinguishable from the dark mould with which they had now become mingled. Smiling at this ominous token of his thoughts, Danby lifted his head, and passed on.

There was a crowd in the kitchen of Paul Burrill. His old wife had retired to rest near an hour before, and of the household only Paul and his son remained; the latter standing on one side of the fireplace, while the old man sat at the other corner.

"You have heard us, Paul Burrill," continued Carroll, who had just communicated the notice of quitting—"you have heard us, and seen the authority which obliges us to act. What say you, then? Will you submit to this necessity peaceably and quietly, or will you not?"

There was no reply. Paul sat with both hands placed on the head of his staff, his chin resting on them, his sharp, gray eyes half buried beneath the bushy white brows, glancing from one to the other of his unwelcome visitors. The silence was broken by the young squire.

"It grieves me much," he said, advancing—"it grieves me very much, sir, that you do not realize the constraint under which we ourselves are placed, and that the attitude which we assume toward yourself and one or two others, is in principle an act of mere self-defence. Nor do you appreciate, I fear, the sacrifice which some of us are ready to make in taking up the farms you at this moment occupy. Surely we all regret, we very much regret—"

"Stop, Benjamin Danby!" interrupted Paul. "Much as I dislike you and your breed, I would not have you lead your conscience with too many lies at any one time. Now do you and Luke Carroll listen for a moment to what I have to say. You, Benjamin Danby, talk of regret at doing anything that can further your interest or your spite? It is not in your blood, nor your father's to feel it. Mark me! Fifteen years ago, your father, by a mean, pettifogging trick, deprived me of every cent I possessed in the world. Two years after, my eldest son died in the street a drunkard. Who made him so? You, Luke Carroll!"

"You wrong me, Paul!" exclaimed Carroll, with a troubled voice.

"Liar!" cried old Burrill, his eyes glistening with fierce excitement, and his cane half raised in his hand. "But stop, I will contain myself. Think you, that I am going to pay heed to your commands, your honeyed insinuations! Never! Not a step will I budge from this house, I or mine, till violence remove us. Whatever harm comes of it, be it on your own heads."

"Mr. Burrill," replied Danby, "it is a pity that you will not listen to reason. But as you have determined to resist the law and the authorities, you must needs take the consequence. As for your invectives against my honored father, I can let them pass for what they are worth. But if I am not very much mistaken, you might have offset your abuse by saying that it was to his efforts solely that you were not many years ago a condemned criminal and a tenant of a jail."

The old man whom he addressed turned his head, and for a moment gazed steadily at his son, who still remained immovable at the opposite corner of the fireplace.

"John," the older Burrill said, in a low, stern voice, "did you hear what he has just said? And do you stand there calm and unmoved, while this young villain flings his lying venom in my face? Have you no blood in your veins! Shame on you! shame!"

The youth flushed red, and for an instant laid his hand on the narrow mantel-piece, as though to steady himself; then, withdrawing it, thrust it behind him and remained as motionless as before. A look of something like contemptuous pity flashed over the old man's face, and he turned again to his visitors.

"Go," he said, pointing to the door. "Take your course; what mine will be, I have already told you."

Thus commanded, the parties addressed went out as quickly as possible, scarcely either of them possessing at the moment the like feeling with his companions. In Carroll a large degree of sympathy mingled with his political animosity. But in the former feeling he was nearly alone.

"The old reprobate!" cried one. "He's no better than a jail-bird let loose. Think of him trying to urge his son into a squabble the way he did!"

"Phe!" replied another; "I don't blame the old fellow. That boy of his has no more spunk than a cow. He's a coward, and the old man knows it."

"Perhaps so; any how, if I'd been in John's place, I think I should have been likely to have showed a little fin."

The company forthwith determined on proceeding to the tavern of Carroll, where they might find a fit place, and the good liquor wherein to celebrate the decisive step which they had taken in behalf of the supposed rightful authority of New York—for the deed was considered as good as done, now that the intention was so clearly proclaimed. Speech-making and the singing of partizan songs mingled by turns with the flowing honors offered in full glasses to the York dignitaries, civil and military. It was getting well towards midnight before the company thought of dispersing. Danby was one of the first to leave. But he had scarce taken his departure, when he re-appeared with a frightened look, and gave information that a body of armed men had surrounded the house.

"Out with the lights!" exclaimed Carroll, hastily, "and secure doors and windows. "They must be Hampshire men! There are a few king's arms below!"

As he spoke, a volley of musketry crashed through the upper panes of the second story windows, and immediately the main door of the building was assailed by repeated and heavy blows.

"We demand," cried a loud voice from without, "the persons of Luke Carroll and Benjamin Danby, traitors against the laws, and accused of conspiracy with the British."

"Your charge is false!" replied Carroll, undauntedly. "We are a law abiding people—as sail us at your peril! We are prepared for you!"

"Give it to them, boys!" was the rejoinder. "Kont them out of their barrows!"

The butts of their muskets clanging on the door, soon splintered its panels and forced an entrance. Armed men crowding in quickly, spread themselves over the house amid the cries of terrified women, oaths of assailants and assailed, the clashing of weapons, straggling shots, and sounds which, in the oft prevailing darkness, were clothed with more than their natural share of alarm. The contest was soon over, and the object of the assailants attained. Much more than attained as concerned Carroll, who lay unconscious on the bar-room floor, his head supported by his frenzied daughter. Candles had been found and lighted, and as the terrified girl gazed about the room, her eye caught that of young Barrill, who, musket in hand, stood dejectedly near. Her countenance underwent an instant change, flashing at once with indignation and scorn, as she accosted him:

"This, then, is your doing, Master John! Brave Master John, who dare not do his will in broad day, but comes with mach help to murder in the dark! Brave Master John!"

"Lucy," he said, with a half-choked voice, "I would not have harmed a hair of his head. I came here with the rest, it is true, but—"

He stopped, unable to proceed. The look with which Lucy's eyes turned from him, and the pitying glance which they cast on the captive Danby, were too much for young Barrill to bear. As he was going away, a huge hand gripped him by the shoulder:

"Don't make a fool o' yourself," said his rough friend, "nor take on about the gal's scolding. Old Carroll's got nothing more than a nice whack on the head, and he'll be all right to-morrow. Why, bless you, it's just nothing at all."

Three days had passed, since the occurrences last mentioned, and Guilford already appeared a miniature epitome of civil war. Houses and shops closed and barred, the street deserted—all seemed gloomy and desolate. Sunday had arrived, the wonted day of peace and rest to body and soul; the good old day of general re-union at one common church. Now, the doors of the meeting-house were shut—no sound of singing issued from its walls, and in the hearts of those who had been wont to assemble there as brothers, now reigned discord, hatred and mutual revenge. Of all this, thought the good, white-haired pastor, as he stood in the porch of his little dwelling, his eyes so dimmed with tears that he could scarce discern the scene before him, familiar to his office for more than forty years. In this mood he was unaware of the approach of a brisk little man, who hurried up to him with :

"Ah! good morning, good morning, parson. Sad times these—sad times. I have called for you this morning, as I promised, to accompany you to the Burrills. Great trouble there, sir—great trouble. I really can't tell how it will end."

The old clergyman had already donned his well worn cocked hat, and had turned from his threshold in company with the little doctor.

"Is the young man no better?" inquired he.

"Not at all, sir—not at all. Symptoms very bad indeed. Lies insensible, breathing hard and labored—sometimes convulsive. There is reason to fear one of the balls may have penetrated the lungs."

"How did this matter happen?" inquired the pastor. "When I heard of it very early this morning, the story was told so confusedly that I could scarce gain a clear idea of the affair."

"Why, Parson Morris," replied the doctor, lowering his voice with an air of special confidence, "I really believe, in my own mind that the Danbys are somewhere at the bottom of the whole affair. You will understand, that when the young squire was carried off by the Hampshire men the other night, he was presently released by them on his solemn promise to make himself scarce for the present, and to answer for the good behaviour of old Danby himself. I've heard that he did this the more readily, because certain suspicions are afloat concerning some communications reported to have been had between themselves and the British. But I know that it is impossible in the nature of the Danbys to live without mischief-making, and I am morally certain that they set on this gang of Yorkers who last night attacked Burrill's house. They found the old man ready for them, however, and when they undertook to rush into the house, he levelled one of their number with the first shot. Infuriated at this, they fired point blank into the house, burst in and struck down the elder Burrill. All the associates of the latter had fled, except the son, who, by what I have heard, must have fought like a lion, nearly killing several, before he was brought down, with at least three balls shot into him."

"And the old people?"

"Ah, sir, it's a sorry sight! Old Paul sits with his face leaned over on his hands, not stirring, neither looking at, or speaking to any one. The old wife has gone out of her head, poor thing, though she's quite peaceable, and tottles about twisting her fingers, and murmuring to herself. She was slightly touched, it seems, at the first fire, though she was in an inner room."

After a rather long walk, Doctor Perley and his venerable companion arrived at the Burrills. A neighbor's daughter ushered them into a large room where John Burrill lay. Here also were the father and mother; and the clergyman, who had already visited them for a short space early in the morning, attempted as before to offer some words of consolation, and especially to open the heart of old Paul, which seemed closed and locked as with a bolt of iron. But his efforts seemed of so little effect that the worthy man turned away at length, discouraged and sighing. The doctor beckoned him to the door.

"Where is your niece Patty?" inquired the doctor. "More help is needed here; but we want exactly the right sort of help. Especially on the lad's account. His situation is very critical, and very much will depend on skilful and careful nursing."

"I am sorry, indeed," replied the elder; "but Patty is now at Brattleborough, or over on the other side of the river, I know not which. I dare say, however, that we can get her here by to-morrow."

"Let us have her here then as early as possible. But who is this? Lucy Carroll, as I am a living man!"

The girl sped by him like a ghost. Flitting white and silent by, she sank down at the feet of the old father within. Paul raised his head in astonishment; at the sight of the maiden, his cold, gray eyes grew still more chill and steely in their look. But Lucy, seizing his hands within her own, gazed up into his face with such a wild, imploring look, that his eyelids trembled, and a faint, quivering movement spread itself over his countenance.

"O, sir, they tell me he is dying! It cannot be—it cannot be. Suffer me but to watch over him, and you, and her. Do not bid me away!"

Paul made a slight effort as though to disengage his hand; he turned away his head; a groan straggled from his heaving chest. Lucy rose, and bending over him, pressed her lips to his forehead; then, gliding away, took her station by the bed whereon the son lay. So calmly and quickly did she adjust herself to the gentle duties of the task she had undertaken, that the good doctor stood speechless, watching her with admiring surprise. At last, however, he turned toward Elder Morris, and touching him with his forefinger, said with a sly twinkle of his eyes:

"Elder, on second thought it will hardly be necessary to send for Patty on purpose. On the whole, I think we will be able to get along pretty tolerably as it is."

"Servant, sir;" and with this rather rough salutation, a tall, broad-shouldered man, with shock hair and piercing blue eyes, strode into the room, and after a hasty glance at the bed, walked straight up to old Paul, who had scarce noticed his entrance, and placed a huge hand on his shoulder. "Paul!" he said.

The old man sprang on his feet at the sound, and an enthusiasm like that of youth flushed in his face, as he seized the proffered grasp. But the joyous light passed away as quickly as it had come, for his eyes turned instinctively towards his son. The stranger (for such he was to most of those present) pressed the fingers of the old man still more tightly, and his voice was deep and full of emotion.

"Paul Burrill," he said—"Paul, you have been a dear friend to Ethan Allen; and by the living heaven, he is not one to forget either friend or foe. If it indeed be that your son lose his life, there's not one of his cowardly murderers but shall pay for his blood, to the last drop."

"There is One to whom vengeance belongeth," interrupted the voice of the old clergyman.

Allen was for a moment abashed.

"Your pardon, parson," he replied to the elder. "I had forgotten that one of your cloth was present. You have spoken fitly, and as becomes your office. But each one to his part. You are a man of peace—I a man of the sword. I, also, must do my duty."

"O, beware, sir," said Lucy, who had stolen toward him unperceived—"beware, sir, what you do. And for the life of John Burrill fear not—for I know that it is given into my hands."

Allen looked at her with wonder.

"Marvellous!" he exclaimed. "I do believe the gal's inspired. And if she's determined that it shall be so, I can't say that 'twill be the contrary. These women will have their way."

With these words he left the house as abruptly as he had entered, mounted his horse which had been fastened to a neighboring tree, and rode to the green in the centre of the village, where a troop of fifty or more horsemen sat in saddle, surrounded by the greater part of the male population of the settlement. Worthy Doctor Perley hurrying to the ground as fast as his less speedy means of locomotion would permit, found Allen addressing the town's people with a rude but energetic oratory.

"I tell you, people of Guilford," continued the hardy soldier, "that you are nothing but a pack of fools. You have suffered yourselves to be led by the nose by two rascally lawyers named Danby, father and son, who are the devil's own imps in disguise, as I do verily believe. Why, I have in my coat pocket proof in their own hand writing, that they have sold themselves to the British, for whom they have been plotting these three months. And this York game has been but a means to draw you on toward their purposes. Now, mark me closely, men of Guilford. If you do not, henceforth and forever, desist from those tyrannical proceedings of which you have lately been guilty, and behave yourselves as becomes true patriots, then, by the powers of the sky, and the Continental Congress, I, Ethan Allen, will make the town of Guilford as desolate as ever were Sodom and Gomorrah of old. Mind that; and remember that Ethan Allen never yet broke his promise!"

He wheeled his horse, gave the word of command to his men, and the troop rode off at full speed. The crowd of villagers dispersed slowly. The earnest, though rather hyperbolic address of Allen, and the various incidents of the last few days, had inspired a pacific feeling in the minds of all. Hardly a doubt existed in the minds of any with regard to the treachery of the Danbys; for during the five or six hours previous, rumors laden with every semblance of truth had penetrated throughout the whole village. The tide of popular sentiment, too, had turned in favor of the younger Burrill. Men who held him in reproach, as devoid of spirit and character, were now eager to avow their change of conviction. He had shown an example of self-restraint which ought to have been better followed. On the one hand he had sought to guard against the vehemence of his father—on the other he had borne up manfully against the jeers of his antagonists, till, at the last, he had shown a fire and a desperation most remarkable. Carroll, to his credit be it said, had been first to own his error, and to lament its consequences.

"Doctor,"—thus he addressed the bustling and sympathizing physician—"I thought the Danbys were little less than saints. As it is, I am ashamed of their company, and of my own doings also. I had no hand in the present trouble of the Burrills, though I must own that I am in some degree mixed up with it. Say to Paul, for I know not how to meet him now, that I hope the time will come when he can take me as his friend. What I can do, I will, toward repairing the mischief of the past."

In a year from that time, the dwellers in Guilford were knitted together once more in the bonds of neighborly kindness. John Burrill and his wife Lucy, a most happy couple, were living in a new cottage, half way between Carroll's and the elder Burrill's. The Danbys were never again heard of within the limits of the States; the father and son having fled on the discovery of their treacherous plots.

MARGARET.

BY CLARA AUGUSTA.

Crowned with a coronet of grace,
Breaking in blushes o'er her face;
Her brow so calm, and pure, and sweet,
You long to worship at her feet.

The azure flush of summer skies
Has lent its glory to her eyes!
Her hair has caught the rippling gold
Around the sunset pillars rolled.

Celestial goddesses might blush,
From their ripe Paradisiac flush,
To see the tempting damask mouth
Of this fair daughter of the south!

She walks—a thing of shining light—
In majesty on truth's stern height;
Her white robes round her slivery fair,
A bath of Tyrian sweets the air!

Children of poverty—the gnome!
With spectre Want within each home—
Rise up this priestess fair to bless,
Whose hand relieves their wretchedness.

The very brutes on pasture hills,
Cooling beneath the beech tree's stills,
Turn loving eyes as she goes by,
For water from the spring-wall nigh.

The milk-white kitten softly purr,
And licks no other hand than hers;
His gentle paws he puts to rest
Upon the velvet of her breast.

The robins do not fear to sing
Their lyrics in her grape-vine swing;
The nightingale—bird of the stars!
Chants boldly on her window bars!

The winds are loth to toes her curls
Rudely as those of other girls—
And it does seem all nature tries
To gather flavor in her eyes!

A mote upon the shoreless sea
Of life—she has rare smiles for me!
She fills my heart! Cares I forgot
In thoughts of queenly Margaret!

THE BROTHERS' MEETING:

—OR—

A NIGHT IN THE STRAITS OF SUNDA.

A FORECASTLE YARN.

BY JAMES F. ALCORN.

SOL BENTON was the most inveterate yarn-spinner I ever met with—a sort of Munchausen; such as are frequently met with aboard of long voyagers—men who despise all that portion of the seafaring fraternity who from choice or other causes prefer the coasting trade, or short to long voyages. He and I were ship, and indeed watch-mates, on board the ship "Wing of the Wind," an East Indiaman, and night after night I and my watch-mates have sat spell-bound, all through the middle, or first watch, as the case might be, listening to the relation by him, of his hair-breadth adventures by flood and deck, one of which I will give my readers in his own words.

"Yes!" said he, in reply to a demand by one of the watch, "if he had ever encountered a pirate," and as a preface to the yarn I am about to relate; "I've met more'n one o' the fellows since I've bin to sea, and fought 'em, for that matter; but about the toughest fight I ever got mixed up with 'em in, was here away"—(we were off the sand heads at the time)—"a matter of some twenty-five, or maybe thirty year ago.

"Ye see, I'd bin cast away in a typhoon and got carried to Calcutta, where I an' two or three o' my shipmates joined a vessel bound up to Canton for a cargo of silk and tea.

"The skipper as we shipped with didn't have a rag of a character among the shorefolks in Calcutta, some of whom represented him as a bloody pirate, or something worse, telling all manner o' yarns about him, and trying to prevent white men from joining the ship, or going in her.

"But we stuck by. In fact I kinder tack a fancy to the skipper, for he was young and looked like a darn good fellow, while the way he issued his orders an' moved round the deck, proved him to be a prime sailor. We sailed, but hadn't got clear o' the river when it leaked out for'ad somehow, 'at there was twenty-eight thousand dollars in gold on board, stowed in the cabin. That ere made all hands kinder skeery, 'cause ye see if sich a thing had got wind in Calcutta afore or after the ship sailed, she was sure to be attacked by pirates in the Straits, or afore she got there. There was plenty o' the pesky critters afloat in these waters then, an' they managed by some means to keep purty well posted consarnin the amount o' money as each ship carried out o' port.

"Things went smoothly enough until we run nearly down to the Straits. We didn't see nothing suspicious in the shape of vessels, nor nothing, until one afternoon, when we was expecting to make Sumatra next day. 'Twas getting along to eight bells, an' the second mate was aloft, examining the sarrice on the main topgallant stay, where the foot of the royal had been chafing a spell, the batten having got off that day. All at once he sung out, 'Sail ho' and afore the old man could ask, 'where away,' was coming down the backstays like lightning.

"I knowed there was something up, right off, an' so I went aft, pretendin' to lay up the main brace, which was hove down on deck, but really wanting to hear what he said about the stranger.

"'Why, Mr. Mosely,' says the old man, 'what's the matter? You look s'if you'd seen the sea serpent.'

"'Matter enough, captain!' says the second mate. 'That there sail's the "Pirate of Sunda." If taint I'll agree to go on short allowance of grog for a week.'

"'The Pirate of Sunda!' said the skipper, seizing his glass from the becket. 'How did he bear?'

"'Broad on the starboard bow, an' stan'in athwart hawse of us,' says the dicky; whereupon the skipper mounted the main rigging, an' set'tin himself on the topsail yard, begun to squint at the stranger.

"By the time I'd got the mainbrace laid up, the old man had made his mind up about the vessel, for he sung out: 'Turn all hands up, Mr. Mosely, an' get the stunsails out! Call the mate! Bear a hand! we must show that fellow a clean pair of heels.'

"We had the stunsails out, an' the gear rove, in less'n no time, when the old man laid down from aloft, an' tuk his station 'longside the wheel, while we rigged out the booms alow an' aloft an' give her the muslin. I tell ye the way the old ship ploughed the brine, was a caution to green horns. We had 'bout all the wind we wanted, and it soon begun to be purty evident we'd give the stranger the go-by if he didn't wake up a bit. In less'n fifteen minutes arter we'd finished making sail we had him hull up off deck an' bearing 'bout five an' a half points on the bow, when we could see him keep away, and purty soon up went his stunsails.

"'That's your game, is it?' says the skipper. 'Thank Heaven, two can play at it! Mr. Barnes,' says he to the mate, 'I guess you'd better have the guns all ready. By the way, that fellow moves; it seems he's bound to furnish us work for them.'

"'Ay, ay, sir!' says the mate. 'He acts s'if a dose of cannister wouldn't do any harm,' an' at it we went, clearin' away the barkers—we had six on 'em—real beauties—and reeving of gun-tackle, an' etcetera.

"By two bells we'd all ready—fires out and guns loaded to the muzzle, all 'cept one; an' that the old man had histed onto the poop, an' loaded with round shot, so as to have a lick at his spars, if he show'd ugly afore he got into short range, which he didn't seem likely to do, judging by the way we crawled ahead of him.

"We had him abeam an' 'bout a mile off by the time we'd got through, when the skipper said's how we might get supper, an' be all ready in case we was wanted, for, says he, 'That's the Pirate of Sunda, men, an' no mistake; an' we have to fight him sure, if we can't outrun him.'

"Well ye see, that there information didn't add much to our appetites nohow! I guess all hands didn't eat enough—an' there were forty of us, all told—to make a supper for ten longshore men a'ter they'd bin on a spree for a week. Howsomever, much or little, we hadn't got through when the stranger fired a gun, an' showed British buntin'.

"'No ye don't!' says the old man, as soon's he see'd her colors. 'Show him the gridiron, Mr. Barnes! He can't fool me with the "meteor flag!'" He might as well show the death's head an' cross bones at once!'

"'Perhaps he would if he could only get within short range,' says the mate. 'Wouldn't it be about as well to haul to, to starboard a couple of points? We'd hold a stronger breeze, and fetch him astarn sooner.'

"'Yes, and aid him to shorten the distance between us!' says the skipper. 'No, no, Mr. Barnes! We have nothing to spare to starboard; but I've half a mind to haul to for the main; if it were not for the risk of being becalmed under the land, when we would have more than this fellow to deal with. Let her go as she is till dark, there's no moon to-night, and see if I don't double on him.'

"The old man went below then, leavin' the mate in charge, while the second mate an' steward were busy overhauling the arms-chest and passin' out pistols ready for use. He hadn't bin gone more'n a minute, when bang went another gun on board the pirate, and a shot struck the water about a hundred yards astarn. That brought the old man up from below mighty quick, when he sung out:

"'In starboard lower an' topmast-stunsails! We must get that fellow astarn or he'll be taking the sticks out of us with that big gun.'

"I'll tell you what, them stunsails come down by the run, an' afore you could say Jack Robinson, the yards were checked, an' the old ship headin' up E. S. E. We hadn't got the stunsails made up though, afore the pirate twig'ed the move, an' sent a whole broadside after us, but it didn't reach us by a longways. Then he tried his long gun, an' hove a shot close alongside. He fired again as fast's he could load, an' put a round shot through our mainsail. A third time he was more fortunate, for he hit the mizzen top an' stove one side of it all to pieces, while the shot passed on an' lodged in the mainyard, 'bout five feet from the slings.

"'Twas luck for us it was almost dark, for if he had had light enough to kept us in view another half hour, he'd took some of the sticks out of us sure, but as it was, that shot was the only one as did any material damage, an' he only fired a couple more, when it had got to be so dark he couldn't see us nor we him.

" 'I guess that fellow's 'bout done for t'night,' said the skipper, soon's we lost sight of the pirate. 'He wout be likely to get another shot at us to-night, an' if this wind only holds good, I'll bet a big apple he wout in the morning.'

"Don't ye think, the old man hadn't more'n got the words said, when flap went the courses agin the masts; the wind had begun to die away. From that minute the breeze kept growin' less an' less, until 'bout six bells in the first watch, when it had died away 'bout dead calm. My eye! Didn't the old man swear a little! We were in for it sure, an' were 'bout makin' our minds up to have our throats cut, when the skipper, who was stan'in' aft, lookin' over the topsail, sung out:

" 'What in thunder! Where does that light come from? I told that confounded steward to ship them after dead-lights! Jump down, Mr. Barnes, an' put that cabin lamp out! I shouldn't wonder if we had some more o' them round shot about our ears,' an' he bent down over the taffrail to see where the light came from. But he hadn't more'n done it, when he jumped back an' says he: 'Mr. Barnes! drag that —— Ethiopian up here! Lay aft here all hands!'

"We mustered aft in less'n no time, when he sung cut, 'We've got a traitor amongst us, men! Just look over the starn!'

"We did so, an' I'm blowed if there warn't a signal lantern, all lit up, an' hanging under one of the starn winders. Made us mad as thunder, when we see it, an' by the time the mate had hauled it in, we were 'bout ready to eat the steward. He came on deck with the mate, an' looked mighty blue he did when the old man asked him how that lantern come hangin' out the starn winder. The darn'd nigger said he didn't know; but 'twan't no use. We all know'd he did it, an' told him so; so by-m'by he give in, an' owned up as he did it for a signal to the pirates.

"When the old man heard that it made him awful ugly. He made a spring at the darkey, an' catchin' him by the throat, choked him till he'd almost killed him, an' then he hove him on deck an' jumped on him two or three times. Darn the fellow! I pitied him; but I knew he deserved it, so let him slide.

"When the old man left him he laid for dead, we let him lay, for just then we heard the measured an' muffled sound of oars nearly alongside.

" 'Jump to the guns, men!' shouted the old man, an' we did, while at the same instant a most infernal yell broke on the stillness of the night, an' a minute after, one, two, three boats dashed into view in quick succession. They were crowded with men, an' in less'n five minutes were right alongside an' fast to us, while their crews were clambering up the ship's side an' over the rails in half dozens. One of them laid us aboard in the forechains, another at the main, an' the third hooked on to the mizen chains, where she was stove by the skipper as soon's she touched, who darted a couple of cold shot into her, knocking a hole in her bow as quicker'n lightning, while hardly one of her crew gained our deck but were cut down or tumbled overboard by the skipper and some eight or ten of our lads who had remained aft to receive them.

"We had our hands full for'ad though. Jes as fast's one o' the rascals fell wounded or dead, half a dozen jumped into his tracks from the rail, until they outnumbered us, an' were driving us aft, inch by inch, when the capt'n an' his gang, havin' settled accounts with the crew of the stern boat, jumped down on the main deck to lend us a hand.

"We had used our pistols with good effect at first, but they pressed us so hard, we'd no time to re-load; so we had to trust to our cutlasses, at which they were more'n a match for us, an' though we made a stand for a few minutes, after the old man joined us, we were again forced to give way an' retreat.

"Our men were falling every minute, an' there was every prospect of havin' all our throats cut, when the old man shouted—'Give way to starboard an' port, men!' an' we did give way, when bang! the old man fired one of the guns, which he had slewed round, an' pointed right at the thickest of the pirates. That discharge mowed down more'n a dozen of 'em, and kinder raised our courage, so that we drove 'em for'ad almost to the foremast, where they rallied again, when the fight became fiercer than ever. In the meantime the skipper had got another gun to bear on 'em, but didn't dare to fire it lest he'd kill as many of his own crew as of the pirates.

"We had to give way in turn, and were falling back slowly on the maindeck, some one of our number being cut down momentarily, when the skipper sung out: 'Avast the Marions!' meaning our crew. 'Down, every man!' but we couldn't do it, so the old man jumped into the thickest of the fight himself, an' was soon engaged hand to hand with the leader of the pirates. Just then I lost sight of him an' got entangled with a fellow 'at I'd bin trying to get foul of for sometime. I had it in for him from the first. Ye see he hit me a thundering clip on the head, just as he jumped from the rail; almost laid me over. I used to be considered some punkins with a cutlass, in the sarvice, an' had come off first in every single-handed tussle that night, but I'm blessed if I hadn't met my match at last. We cut away at each other sometime, but couldn't get blood, when all at once he made a lunge at me, which I made an attempt to parry, when my foot slipped an' I fell backward, expectin' every instant to feel the pirate's cutlass between my ribs. But I didn't. Just as I fell the mate jumped in an' took my place, an' catching the fellow foul, pinked him quicker'n you could say beans.

"When I got up I found the fight had kinder slackened on both sides, a good many of the survivors being too deeply intent on the issue of the fight between our old man and the leader of the pirates, to think of further hostility for the time. They were both splendid swordsmen, an' about as well matched for size an' weight as they could be, while the way their cutlasses twisted an' twined 'round each other was a caution. First one give way an' then the other, but neither could boast of any advantage for nearly ten minutes, when they separated by mutual consent, to regain breath. Their separation was the signal for renewed contest between their supporters, which was commenced by our mate, who had trained the gun—before prepared by the skipper—to bear on our assailants, during the cessation of hostilities, an' now fired it, annihilating nearly one third of our antagonists.

"The rest were speedily driven for'ad, with the exception of their leader, who, on perceiving the havoc made by the discharge among his followers, instantly returned to the fight, in which he was again met by the old man. One by one, they fell dead or wounded beneath our blows, until but few remained; an' they, afeared to linger longer where death awaited them, jumped into their boats an' shoved off, leaving their leader to our tender mercies. Him we soon secured, after he'd succeeded in wounding our cap'n severely. But we had scarcely made him a prisoner when a cheer of defiance from the remnant of his followers, answered by one more distant, warned us of their return, with fresh forces.

"I tell you what, lads! that answering cheer appalled with fear the hearts of all who heard it, for we were few an' exhausted with the conflict, besides being encumbered with the dead an' wounded of both parties, who lay in heaps on our deck. On came the attacking party, while we re-loaded the guns an' run 'em out, depressing their muzzles to the lowest angle, hoping to be able to pour their contents into the approaching boats, ere they could gain a hold on the ship. But fortune favored us when least expected, for just as we heard the splash of their oars, a gentle breeze filled our sails, giving the ship steerage way; when we sprang to the braces an' in a few moments the old boat was going three knots through the water, with a gentle but freshening breeze on the quarter.

"The way we cheered them wasn't slow, I tell you, an' had you heard the way them fellows swore an' tuk on, you'd a thought we wouldn't have met much mercy had they bin aboard. But they didn't get aboard, for the breeze come up quick, and in less'n five minutes we were going good seven an' a half, an' leavin' 'em astern at no small rate.

"We'd got one gun onto the quarter deck afore they boarded us, an' that the mate now ordered us to bowse aft to the topsail, when he fired a pistol in the direction of the boats, hoping they would return the compliment, an' betray their exact whereabouts. The ruse succeeded to a charm, for they replied with a discharge of some fifteen or twenty shots, one of which killed the second mate on the spot, an' another struck me on the arm, just below the elbow, an' broke it.

"At the instant they fired the mate was glancing along the gun, awaiting the flash of the expected volley, to enable him to point the piece with some show of success. She was about right, an' jumping one side he applied the match. It was a success judging by the yells an' screeching which followed the report, an' lasted for mor'n a minute, when it died away an' all was silent as the grave, save the ripple of the sea an' the rush of water under the ship's bow and along her waist an' counter.

"We got lanterns then an' mustered aft, when we counted ten able to stand an' go, myself included, twenty of our original number being missing. Of them we found fourteen killed an' wounded, on deck, while of the pirates we counted sixty-eight dead an' wounded, including their leader who lay bound hand an' foot, an' slightly wounded—besides a number of pieces of bodies—legs an' arms, etc., which had bin blown to pieces by the two discharges.

"The dead an' wounded of the pirates shared the fate of our dead shipmates, though we hove their bodies overboard with less regret than those of our gallant shipmates; while in the meantime our wounded, including the cap'n, were conveyed to the cabin an' made as comfortable as our means would admit.

"The pirate cap'n—as he afterwards proved to be—we placed in double irons, an' then we had a drink all round on the head of our victory. 'Twas daylight by that time, an' we could see the pirate ship hove to an' hull down to the west'ard, which relieved us of all further apprehension concerning her, when we turned in, all hands save the mate, the man at the wheel an' I; an' I followed the other's example as soon as Mr. Barnes had sot my broken arm an' secured it.

"At eight bells the mate roused all hands out to wash decks an' get breakfast, after which the skipper sent for us to go to his state-room. We went in a body, when he said a great sight 'bout our brave defence of the ship an' our own lives, an' so on, winding up with a request to see the pirate skipper. He was soon brought into the cabin, ironed as he was, an' ushered into the presence of the cap'n, who asked him a sight o' questions, an' among the rest what his name was.

"'Wilbur!' says the pirate, at which our skipper started partly upright in his berth, an' says he kinder sudden, 'Wilbur, did you say!'

"'I did,' says the pirate, kinder surprised.

"'And you belong in ——?'

"'What is it to you where I belong?' growled the pirate, with an angry scowl.

"'Much!' groaned our cap'n.

"'How so?'

"'Answer my question, an' I will answer yours,' says the old man, eagerly.

"'Humph! Well! it can do no harm if you do know,' muttered the pirate, adding aloud: 'You belong in the United States?'

"'Yes! I belong to Boston. But what has this to do with the answer to my question, unless indeed, you —'

"'Belong there,' said the pirate, interrupting him. 'Yes! Boston city is my native place;' an' his head sunk on his breast, while he drew his hand hastily across his eyes.

"'Boston's your native place, you say? an' your first name is —'

"'Henry!' said the pirate, sadly.

"'Yes! I thought so! Look up! My name is Wilbur. Alas! am I so changed that you cannot recognize me? Take off his irons, Mr. Barnes, an' leave us!'

"The mate hastily unlocked the handcuffs, while their wearer, gazing amazed at our skipper, muttered:

"'You a Wilbur, an' born in Boston! Who are you? Speak, in Heaven's name, an' tell me that my hand has not been raised against —'

"'Your brother George!' said the old man, interrupting him, an' the next instant they were clasped in each other's arms.

"We stole out o' the state-room quietly an' left 'em together, but 'twant long afore the pirate come out an' called the mate, an' they went into the cabin together, where they stayed a long time, when the mate come out an' told us a long yarn 'bout how he'd come to be a pirate an' all that, an' wanted to know if we'd give him up to be hung when we got to Batavia, or give him a chance to lead a different life?

"Darn my buttons if I could say hang him, when I had heard his history; nor could a single one of my shipmates; so we said, 'let him live!' an' so said the mate, an' we were glad of it when we found out what a good fellow he was, even if he was a pirate."

"But you haint told us how he come to be a pirate, Sol," said one of the watch, who believed Sol's yarn to be ended.

"No more I aint!" rejoined my messmate, adding, "but I guess 'taint too late yet."

"Ye see, he run away from home to avoid a licking, which his governor had promised him. He was but a boy then an' couldn't do much to git his own living, so he shipped to go to sea in a whaleman, an' did go. Whaling didn't agree with him, so he an' three or four green horns took it into their heads to desert the ship, which they did in the South Pacific, expectin' to get away from the island they had taken refuge on almost any time. But they were mistaken. They had to stay there a matter of three year afore they got the first chance to leave, an' when they did it was in a whaleman, from which they run away on the coast of China, somewhere up above Whampoa, to which they were carried by a tradin' junk as picked 'em up, when about half starved.

"At Whampoa they joined an English ship bound to London, but their usual luck followed them, for she was run into in the night, an' sunk just outside the Straits of Sunda, by a pirate, who saved most all the crew, but compelled them to turn pirates.

"That's how he got among them, an' being kinder smart an' intelligent, he soon got promoted until they made him cap'n, 'bout two year afore we fell in with him.

"I see'd him once since. 'Twas in New York, 'bout eight or ten year ago. He knew me an' hailed me, an' made me go to the hotel with him, where we talked over old times—for he an' I had got to be regular chums afore our ship left Batavia, where we had to put in for a crew after the fight.

THE LEGEND OF ENSSENTHAL.

BY ELIZABETH BOUTON.

Lonely in the silent valley
Stands a convent's ruined wall,
Where once rose the lofty turrets
Of monastic Ensenthal.

Ensenthal, whose abbot hoary
Once a princely name had worn,
And o'er Palestine his banner
In the holy wars had borne.

Till of fame and life grown weary,
He had sought the cloister's shade,
For a cowl and cassock bartered
Plume and helmet, mail and blade.

Left his vassals to another,
To another left his hall,
And with his overflowing coffers
Enriched monastic Ensenthal.

Here too kings had brought their offerings,
Penance gold to Mary's shrine,
Pearls from 'neath the waves of ocean,
Gems from distant India's mine.

Till the priceless treasures hidden
By the monk-knights of the vale,
Seemed to wondering ears that heard it
Like some o'erwrought fairy tale.

But no treasure half so cherished,
Shrine of saint or relic old,
As the chapel's deep-toned organ,
Formed of massive, burnished gold.

When the morning anthem sounded,
Or the vesper hymn was sung,
Floating o'er the quiet valley
Its melodious measures rung;

Till the pausing traveller listened,
All his senses held in thrall,
By the solemn music peeling
From monastic Ensenthal.

Fame, the gray old convent's story,
Bore to many a distant shore,
Till were heard its organ's praises
Where remotest billows roar.

Long within their peaceful cloister
Had the gray-robed friars old
Told their beads and masses chanted
For the parting sinner's soul—

When bold Rudolph, outlawed chieftain,
Led his sacrilegious band,
To despoil the churches' treasures,
And lay waste with sword and brand.

Vain the holy men's endeavors
The grim warriors to oppose,
And o'er Ensenthal's proud turrets
Waved the banner of her foes.

But ere rose that implous banner
At the holy altar's side,
By stern Rudolph's cruel falchion
Had the gray-haired abbot died.

And to where within the valley
Spread a morass dark and wide,

Bore the priests the golden organ,
And sunk it in the turbid tide.

Lonely in the silent valley
Stands the convent's ruined wall,
But not one of all its dwellers
Ere again saw Ensenthal.

Far in distant regions scattered,
Houseless wanderers, one by one
Died the monk-knights of the valley,
Poor and friendless, sad and lone.

But when seven years are numbered,
Rising from its marshy tomb,
Sounds the golden organ's music
On the solemn midnight's gloom.

Now its low melodious breathings
Softly float upon the gale,
Now to mighty billows swelling
Peal its tones along the vale.

Then the peasants in the valley
Pallid grow with fear and dread,
For they know the vale is peopled
With the spirits of the dead;

And that through departing ages
Still responsive to their call,
Is the long lost golden organ
Of monastic Ensenthal.

MISS VERNE'S DOG.

BY MARGARET VERNE.

ROVER! That was the name they gave me, while I was only a wee bit of a doggie, scarcely able to waddle about on my little, weak, unmanageable legs, Rover! And I learned to run at the call, to bark and frisk and gambol, to testify in my faint dog-fashion, the gratitude I felt. Rover! Ah, was that name prophetic of the destiny which awaited me? Is it possible that those who bestowed it upon me foresaw the wandering, homeless life I was to lead so long? Did they know the yearnings of my puppyhood for something above the ordinary attainments of common puppies? Did they anticipate the struggles and privations of my dog-existence in the years ahead—years, when my heart pined for the music of a kindly human voice, when my head ached to feel the stroking of a caressing human hand, and my whole soul sickened in its utter destitution, longing for the shelter of a kennel and the smell of a marrow-bone?

I was an eccentric dog. Even from my infancy I was given to the expression of thoughts and feelings which made me the laughing-stock of many of my friends, and an object of reproach among the rest. Even my mother failed fully to appreciate the character and disposition of her son. Naturally affectionate, sensitive and proud, I grew haughty and reserved, even among from recent fright, begged for the privilege of fanning me with her brown wings. She seemed an angel to me at that moment, and looking into her lustrous hazel eyes, lifted shyly to mine with a glance of unutterable gratitude; watching the graceful curve of her slender neck, and listening to the tripping music of her light feet, as she glided about me softly and tenderly as a mother could have done, I felt a new emotion creeping into my world-weary heart—an emotion sweet and blissful, as it was new and strange.

Ah, reader, you will anticipate me, I am sure. It will not need what I am about to add, to convince you that this was a case of love at first sight. Yet hear my confession. Before an hour had passed in her gentle presence, I knew I loved that beautiful chicken better than I loved my life. That knowledge brought with it a new fear, an agonizing doubt. Was it possible that she could reciprocate that affection? I was a poor, plain, unhappy little cur, without fortune, friends or social position. She was young, beautiful, the brightest ornament of her family, the pride and hope of a fond mother. And yet, I loved her—I told her so, with the desperation of one who cannot bear doubt or suspense—who would rather face a terrible certainty, than indulge a vain hope. Imagine my rapture, when she drooped her bashful head, and told me that from the first moment of our meeting, she had been favorably impressed with my appearance, and that admiration coupled with gratitude had deepened into love.

Our plans were soon made. All my old ambition came back to me. My beautiful Biddy should never blush in acknowledging the one of her choice. She should not only love me, she should be proud of me. And so I tore myself away from her sweet presence, and went out into the great world inspired with fresh hope and courage. She never should know the degradation of poverty, I said. Not till I had won myself a home, a name, an honorable position among dogs, would I return to claim her.

O, the weary, weary struggle of the next twelve months! Many times was I tempted to give up all hope. But fortune smiled on my importunities at last. I found a master in the streets of a great city, where I had been wandering for months. He took me home, I was faithful to him and his interests, and he kept me. For more than a year I served him zealously. At the end of that time I was in possession of a nice kennel, a soft blanket, and a brass collar. There was nothing to hinder me from going for my Biddy. I had a home, friends, fame, and a true heart. What more could she expect?

Well, I went. I found the very coop from which she had ventured, when the hungry cat pounced upon her. A wee chicken that was the miniature of her as I first saw her, peeped, and ran from me as I approached. I went up softly to the coop, and peered through the bars. O, sight for a fond, trusting heart! There she sat,—my Biddy, a matron—with thirteen children around her! My brain reeled. My heart seemed bursting from my bosom. I called her name in accents of reproach. She flew towards me, her face distorted with rage. She picked me in my eyes, on my nose—the eyes and nose that had once bled for her! O, wee! O, anguish! O, treachery unparalleled!

I went away a sadder and a wiser dog. Life had no more charms for me. I loathed the whole female sex. I railed against them for perfidy and falsehood. But I went not again to my home. I had no heart to cross its desolate threshold, when the hope that glorified it had burned to ashes.

I have little more to add. Life since then has been a continuation of disappointments and disasters. I have a mistress now—a plain, poor, old maid, who treats me kindly enough, and whose hospitable roof I should delight to call my shelter, but for a rival I have in her affections—a huge, speckled cat, who purrs in her lap, and lies unproved among her papers—the very cat, in fact, from whose claws I rescued Biddy years ago. I wish I had let him eat her. I think that he remembers me, for his eyes glitter and he humps his back savagely every time I venture near him.

Last night I told my mistress my story through my eyes, and she offered to become my amanuensis, and write it out for you, dear Mr. Ballou. And she said, taking my head between her hands, that in her life-time she had seen men like me; little men, who barked at great reforms, as I barked at the cow; men who were always taking themselves for bull-dogs, when in reality they were very little curs—men, who, if one woman refused them, would snarl at the whole sex forever after. I don't know what she meant—do you?

To those scenes of domestic peace, which pure religion created and adorned, the thoughts of the youngest member of the family will cling in after years; they will become a kind of hallowed ground in his memory; they will exert a restraining and sanctifying power; and thus we may expect to see the promise fulfilled: "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."—Vermilye.

The generous heart
Should scorn a pleasure which gives others pain.
THOMSON.

STANZAS—YOUNG HOPE.

BY RICHARD WRIGHT.

Young Hope is like the brilliant gem, or sweetest-scented flower;

'Tis known but once, may last for years, or droop within the hour;

But be its reign or long, or short, the heart that feels its glow,

Will ne'er forget in summer's bloom, or winter's frost and snow.

Young Hope! we hail thy magic power, so fervent and so pure,

The holy, sainted dream of life, bright rainbow to allure; And though the dream, the rainbow fade, and fainter still are seen,

While being in, young Hope's first charm will rise up fresh and green.

Young Hope inspires the ardent youth and virtuous maiden fair,

Who tread on fancy's fairy ground, and breathe of fancy's air;

Time, for awhile, may break the spell, the world's cares intervene—

Memory calls back young Hope's sweet smile, like angel visits seen.

Till nature's laws, eternal, change, young Hope's own vivid star,

On high will shine pre-eminent, its rays shoot near and far,

Gliding life's happiest morning with a light before unknown—

Lingering, last star of evening's sky, when all the rest are gone!

VALET FOR A DAY:

—OR,—

A BLOW IN THE DARK.

BY NED ANDERTON.

In one of the streets of the Faubourg —, there stood, during the Regency, a noble old mansion frowning down upon the enclosed courtyard, the residence of the Marquise de Corandeuil, a young and lovely widow, whom an attachment on the part of the late eccentric marquis had raised from superintending the affairs of his household, to the guardianship of himself and gouty foot, until the period of his decease, two years prior to the commencement of this sketch.

Her low birth being now obliterated by the rank and title conferred on her by the marquis, it is not to be supposed that so much wit, youth, and beauty lacked suitors. But the lady having served so tedious a bondage to attain to her present position, was in no haste whatever, to relinquish this easy life of uncontrolled liberty for a new servitude, and remorselessly condemned all aspiring suitors to despair. One only persevered, despite the impatient disgust manifested toward him; this was the nephew of her husband, Baron de Sergy, an old, gray-headed fop, who still affected the graces and gallantries which sat idly enough upon his wrinkled face and meagre form.

It was at the marquise that the chief battery of his fancied fascinations was brought to bear. A degree of affection for herself, and a still larger one for the fortune his uncle had left her, and to which the baron had always supposed himself heir presumptive, were the mingled sentiments that induced his suit, somewhat unequally it is to be feared, since, although he would doubtless have accepted with edifying resignation the fortune without the marquise, it is by no means so well established a fact that he would have received with like rapture the marquise without the fortune.

Into an elegant apartment of the Hotel de Corandeuil, the baron one fine morning found his way, followed by Nicol, the confidential servant of the marquise.

"Has a valet waited on me this morning?" inquired the gentleman.

"Yes, monsieur—he is now in the ante-room."

"Is the marquise yet visible?"

"Madame is in the conservatory," replied Nicol, bowing.

"Very well—I will go to her. Tell the valet to remain here till I return."

And so saying he sauntered off by a door at the right hand, which was scarcely closed after him, when one opposite opened, and a fine tall fellow in livery appeared.

"Was that the Baron de Sergy who just left you?" he inquired of Nicol.

"It was; and he desires you to wait here."

"In this room?"

"Those were his orders," replied Nicol, quitting the apartment.

"Orders!" repeated the valet musingly when left alone. "That word has a decidedly unpleasant sound, but I must not forget the character I represent. My pride must go in livery also, or else I must pocket it which amounts to the same thing in the end."

Here in the course of his perambulatory soliloquy, our philosopher stopped short before a large mirror. A dubious expression crossed his countenance, and he resumed his walk at a more rapid pace, spitefully kicking whatever object he encountered while he continued with some heat:

"No one would suspect me in this garb, to be sure! And now I hope I'm safe—to be recognized as the Chevalier St. Real would be slightly awkward at this present juncture, as the Bastile might petition for the immediate honor of supplying me with lodgings. What an awkward affair was that adventure at Mousseaux last night! The regent, not satisfied with giving his guests a fete in his park by torchlight, with that elegant discrimination for which he is so renowned, must needs order the lights to be extinguished, and like that," here he vigorously snapped his fingers, "we were all in the most delightful darkness.

"Of course I started for the outlet, but in that process stumbled over somebody's foot—just my infernal luck! and hearing a most energetic oath explode at the same moment, I naturally concluded it was a man. Expecting a blow would follow, I took time by the forelock and struck out lustily at random, and instantly heard a musical shriek, plaintive as a dove. Good heavens! A woman had received the blow!

"Having a natural repugnance to fainting fits and hysterics, I fled, but not before I heard the exclamation behind me—'Madame Perabere is ill.' It was then the favorite of the regent whom I had struck! Hang Mousseaux, I say! Hang darkness! Hang the regent! But take care, or it is I that will hang!

"Well, here was a pretty dilemma. Possibly she had recognized my voice, and unfortunately her temper is not always characterized by spring-like gentleness. I could devise no better expedient than to don this disguise, write a letter of recommendation of myself under the cognomen of Francois, my own valet, and apply to the Baron de Sergy for a situation, who by an unexpected stroke of good fortune does not know me personally. But here he comes—now I must look livery as well as wear it."

"Well," said the baron, as he entered, "are you the person who wrote to me?"

"I am, monsieur," replied the seeming valet.

"On account of your late employer, whom I am acquainted with by reputation, I should like to retain you. But as there are at present no vacancies in my establishment, I have spoken to my aunt, the Marquise de Corandeuil, who, learning that you were recommended by the Chevalier St. Real, consents to receive you."

"Much obliged to her, I'm sure!" muttered our hero. Then addressing the baron, he inquired if she knew his late master.

"I cannot tell you. But one thing you will please observe, you owe this situation entirely to my influence."

"Monsieur le Baron, I am the soul of gratitude," replied St. Real, with an obsequious bow.

"Very well, that we shall see; I am now about to confide to your discretion a matter, which I trust you will not betray having received. Some years since, my uncle, the marquis, who was a most eccentric animal, had in his service a youthful and charming housekeeper, who was remarkably skilful in compounding ices and jellies. My worthy relative being a fool as well as an epicure, took it into his wise head one day to marry this pretty goddess of the culinary department."

"I perceive—by the laws of action and reaction her ices kindled a flame in his bosom."

"Just so. The result of this ridiculous union was, that my expectations went to the dogs, where it seemed highly probable I should follow, having nearly exhausted cash and credit. To speak plainly, the marquis, instead of leaving me his fortune, at his decease two years ago, had the very bad taste to settle it all on madame."

"Shameful in the extreme—what reckless disregard of your feelings, monsieur."

"True—but the old gentleman never did possess any regard for the comfort of others. However, to repair his blunder, and set matters in their true position, I propose to marry the marquise, who is still sufficiently captivating to preclude the idea of a sacrifice."

Here the baron surveyed himself in the mirror with the utmost complacency.

"What, monsieur, marry your aunt?" inquired St. Real, slightly surprised.

"Precisely so."

"You have my full consent."

"Doubtless—but unfortunately it is her's that I want; and to obtain it I require your assistance."

"Whatever is possible of performance in my humble capacity, M. le Baron may command."

"To commence then, I must inform you that she hates the very sight of me."

"She is evidently a woman of taste!" ejaculated St. Real, mentally.

"But I imagine if I place a faithful fellow like you about her, and continually harp upon my perfections, and abuse all others in a masterly fashion, much may be done in time, to dissipate her coldness. Do you understand my meaning?"

"O, perfectly! I am to combine the functions of a servant with the avocation of a spy; losing meanwhile no opportunity of knocking everybody else down, and bolstering you up?"

"Your aptitude enchants me. Accept this as a guarantee of my appreciation."

"Thanks, monsieur," said St. Real, pocketing the bribe; "I entirely enter into your feelings. You seek a subtle, cunning, ingenious knave."

"Exactly. I rely implicitly on you in this noble warfare."

"You overwhelm me with honor," replied he of the livery, bowing humbly.

"That's a good Francois; and don't forget that as knowledge is power, and by all means commendable, there can be no possible harm in applying your ears to the doors, and your eyes to the letters—all in a quiet way, of course."

"I comprehend, monsieur—for instance," so saying he motioned as if rounding a note to peep at the contents. "Although not educated," he continued, "I am enough a man of letters for that. The old scamp!" The latter ejaculation was rather less audible.

"Your cleverness quite astonishes me. (Why, the rogue will be invaluable in this enterprise! I'll secure him fast.) So highly do I esteem your discrimination," he resumed, aloud, "that here's a further proof of my favor."

"O, monsieur!" exclaimed St. Real, with affected modesty, holding his hands behind him.

"Pooh! pooh! my fine fellow," cried the baron, as he laughingly forced a louis into the apparently reluctant hands, which by a sudden turn of their owner seemed to present themselves accidentally. "But hush! Here comes the marquise. Leave me, Francois, while I speak to her of you."

"Ah, baron," muttered the chevalier, as De Sergy advanced to meet the lady, "if you could but know the blunder you are making."

At this moment the marquise entered, and taking no notice whatever of the baron, who followed with an inquiring air, began pacing the room in a state of evident disturbance.

"I would give half my fortune," she exclaimed, apparently to herself, "to know who it was—"

"Who who was, I wonder?" muttered the baron.

"Each time I think of it I feel as though I could scarcely breathe. Mousseaux was always my paradise, and after the lights were extinguished by the regent's orders, I received two declarations, four kisses, and—yes—a blow!"

"What a deuce of a temper she is in, to be sure!" soliloquized her wondering suitor.

"To be sure the declarations and kisses were all well enough, but that blow—"

"Dearest aunt!" said the baron, coming to her side.

"O, here you are again. What a bore it is to have a nephew antiquated enough to pass for one's grandfather."

"Captivating aunt!" exclaimed the individual thus complimented, drawing his features into grotesque shape by an effort at a distorted smile.

"Captivating fiddlesticks!" retorted the lady.

"Don't make such frightful grimaces I beg you.

It increases your resemblance to the monkey tribe. A smile on your face reminds me of a butterfly on a nutmeg grater."

"I can't see the simile," mused the discomfited swain; then recovering himself, he resumed:

"Charming, incomparable aunt!—O, that I could add wife. I wish to speak with you of the new valet."

"Where is he?"

"In the ante-room, dearest aunt."

"Bid him come hither. That horrid old man will cause me wrinkles before I'm thirty," she impatiently exclaimed, as the baron advanced to the room adjoining, and beckoned to St. Real. "He irritates me beyond endurance. Well," she said, as the chevalier advanced, then suddenly starting with a faint cry, looked eagerly at the pretended valet.

"What is the matter, sweetest aunt?" tenderly questioned the baron.

"Nothing, nothing—I merely fancied I had seen the man before," leaning back in her chair.

"How absurd!" she whispered, "beside, the other was much more slender." Then turning to St. Real, she said, "Come here."

He slowly approached.

"Come here, I say!" cried the irascible beauty, stamping her foot ill-naturedly.

"Madame, I have not got wings," coolly responded the chevalier, not quickening his movements in the least.

"Who said you had, fool. What is your name? Speak! don't keep me waiting."

"Francois, madame. (She has got a temper of her own.)"

"Well, Francois, I'm in an ill-humor."

"Madame, I should never have expected it," was the sarcastic response.

"Exquisite readiness," chuckled the delighted baron, softly rubbing his hands—"why, he'll do wonders for me."

"Francois!"

"Yes, madame."

"Nothing!" ejaculated his mistress, peevishly.

"Thank you, madame," he replied with the utmost composure.

"I intend taking you into my service. You will have nothing to do, and plenty to eat. Do the conditions suit you?"

"To the letter. At doing nothing I am a master, I beg your pardon—a valet; and in the matter of appetite, from childhood I have been distinguished for my capacity in that respect."

"Yes, yes, I know all about that—servants are just alike," said the marquise.

"There is nothing like experimental knowledge," mumbled the baron.

"Well, Francois, leave me now, but remain in sound of my bell—do you hear?"

"Every word, distinctly, madame," was the cool rejoinder, as the speaker sauntered off at his original, lazy pace.

The marquise now turned her attention to the baron.

"Baron," she remarked, "I have seen you twice before to-day."

"That means go," he sighed with a comical despair. "Yes, darling aunt, I know your observation is correct, yet I could see you a thousand times a day, and—"

"I would not wish to see you once. Good morning, baron," she added with a formal courtesy.

The baron returned this sign of dismissal with an obsequious bow, and retired grumbling.

"Her ill-breeding is remarkable. This comes of entering the drawing-room through the kitchen."

The marquise gave a sigh of relief as he disappeared.

"What astonishing resemblance that valet bears to his former master, the Chevalier St. Real, whom I once loved, when I was lady's maid to his aunt, the Baroness Pascal, at St. Germain's. A lady's maid, and now a marchioness! Could one credit from my air, that I was not born with a ready-made coronet on my head." And she swept up and down the apartment to display her dignified grace.

"Ah!" she resumed, stopping thoughtfully, "the chevalier has forgotten me. I left his aunt and went to the Marquis de Corandeuil as housekeeper, and in becoming his wife destroyed all trace of little Florine, as he once called me. Ah, me!" she cried, sinking into a chair, "his valet recalls a long series of pleasant recollections, and I am not sure that Florine was not happier than the marquise. I've an odd fancy that this valet looks exceedingly like the master—I must take a fresh survey of him." And she touched her hand-bell.

St. Real entered. "Did you ring, madame?"

"Why did you come?"

"Because madame rang."

"Why then did you ask?"

"I believe that is the usual remark of servants."

"The usual remark of servants," repeated the marquise in a low voice; then addressing St. Real—"You are quite right, Francois. (If my memory is not at fault, he is very like.) Francois?"

"Yes, madame."

"I am perishing with ennui. I desire to be amused. Suppose you relate a story."

"What shall I tell, madame?"

"Something I don't know, of course."

"That is impossible, I fear."

"Come, come, proceed; stay, ring for Manon. She shall finish dressing my hair, while you entertain me with some pretty anecdotes. One you heard from your former master."

"I tremble to inform you, madame, that I just gave the servants leave to go out."

"What do I hear!" cried the marquise, jumping up. "You gave them permission, you, you, you!" and she advanced towards him threateningly. "Why I never heard of such audacity. (Ah! he is so like the chevalier that I can't scold him.)"

"Madame," said St. Real with deliberate decision, "I may as well tell you now as at any other time, that I cannot accept a situation unless permitted to do just as I please."

"O!" exclaimed the marquise, faintly, sinking upon a chair. "But at least, I may presume that if you send the servants out, you will perform their several duties."

"Unquestionably, madame. I can do anything—from serving an ice to arranging a lady's hair."

"Perhaps you will demonstrate your skill, then, on mine. (His impudence is refreshing.)"

The marquise now seated herself before the toilette mirror, watching the operations of the chevalier. The latter made a great parade of collecting combs, brushes, oils, pomades, etc. etc.

"I shall endeavor to give madame entire satisfaction," he said, as he commenced an attack upon the magnificent embellishment of the lady's head.

Despite the great length and thickness of the curling tresses, he actually succeeded in rearing a sufficiently graceful and becoming, but it must be confessed, entirely unique superstructure, more resembling a study from the antique, than the senseless fortresses then so much in vogue. The marquise watched its progress in silent admiration. At last he sprinkled powder on it.

"Take care, don't get the powder in my eyes!" cried the lady impatiently.

"I have certainly thrown dust in people's eyes before now, but never powder, especially in such eyes as madame possesses."

"Bah! how awkward you are." Then looking up in his face—"Do you think my eyes pretty?"

"They overflow with sweetness and expression, as my former master would say."

"Your former master; well, tell me something about him. Does he still dislike the military life?"

"I believe so."

"They say he is brave, too."

"He would go through fire and water to serve a friend. Water, in particular, for he can swim."

"I am told he will not fight a duel?"

"No, that's a crotchet he has. I have heard him say many times, that duelling is a relic of barbarous ages."

"Between ourselves, Francois, I think him a bit of a coward."

"A coward!" cried St. Real, coloring.

"What is your opinion?"

"I'll take it on myself to answer for him that he is not."

"Perhaps so. But I'm not at all clear on that point. Where is he now, I wonder? Is he far away?"

"Not very!" replied the chevalier, pointedly.

"Where then?"

"In this city, and closely disguised."

"In disguise!"

"Yes, madame; now you will betray him?"

"I give you my word of honor—no."

"Last night he was at the regent's fete, at Mousseaux, and in the dark struck the regent's favorite, Madame Perabere, by mistake."

"What! That blow which has made so much noise!" exclaimed the marquise, inwardly laughing. ("Then it was St. Real's hand that dealt it, and he thinks Madame Perabere received the blow.") Do you know where he is secreted?"

"I flatter myself I do."

"Is he secure?"

"I hope so—(with all my heart!)"

"Do you think he would be safe here?"

"O, yes, madame, but—"

"But what?" Then going to her escritoire, she continued; "I'll write to him immediately, and you shall carry the letter."

For a moment or two the pen gliding over the surface of the paper was the only audible sound. St. Real then interrupted the silence.

"Your pardon, madame, but may I inquire whence arises this interest? You know him, then?"

"How many b's are there in trouble?" demanded the marquise, still writing, and paying no attention to the chevalier's question.

"Generally speaking, one."

"There—it is finished. Listen. 'I hear you are in trouble. I offer you an asylum in my hotel—do not hesitate to accept my protection.' What a bore writing is when one forgets how to spell," she added, folding the note. "Here, you must direct it." And she handed it to him.

He superscribed and returned it to her, saying: "This is great kindness on your part, madame."

"(That handwriting! I'll swear it is his," said the marquise to herself, looking at the address, "my suspicions are confirmed—it is indeed the chevalier; but he must not know that I recognize him.") Then turning to St. Real, gaily—"You undertake—what did you say your name was?"

"Francois, madame."

"(How well he plays his part!) You undertake to convey this to him safely?"

"Madame may be as easy as if he had it at this moment," he coolly replied, putting it in his pocket.

"Now go and see if the servants are returned, and order luncheon."

"Yes, madame."

"The chevalier here in disguise!" exclaimed the marquise, as St. Real left the room, "and in consequence of the blow I received! If it were any other than he, I would—well, I don't like to confess what I would not do. My new station must change me wonderfully, or he would have recognized, though it is several years since he last saw me. Then we were both poor. Now he has a title and fortune—so have I. What strange changes time does make, yet I still retain the same love I had for him when I was a girl. Stay, before I interrogate my heart too closely, there is a cloud on his courage that I must clear up. Ah! here he is."

St. Real and a servant entered, bearing a small table, spread with a lunch. A chair was placed for the marquise, who seated herself and ordered the servant to retire.

"I trust madame has a good appetite. (I'm furiously hungry myself.)" And he took up a wine glass to help himself.

"Francois, what are you about? Your place is to stand behind my chair."

"Ah, madame, I forgot myself."

"So it appears."

"You will pardon me?" requested the chevalier, taking up his station behind her chair.

"By the way, Francois, to resume the subject we were talking of, is the Chevalier St. Real married?"

"No, madame," responded our hero, taking a maccaroon unseen, and eagerly devouring it.

"Has he never loved?"

Unfortunately his mouth was so full by this time, that reply was not to be thought of.

"Do you not hear me, Francois?"

"Yes, madame," ejaculated St. Real, after one or two frantic, but at first, ineffectual attempts.

"Then why don't you answer?"

Francois preferred to pass over his reasons, good and sufficient though they were, in silence, and prudently proceeded to answer the first on the catalogue.

"Never but once, I think, and that was some years ago."

"Who was the object of his adoration? Some opera dancer, I dare say!"

"Nothing of the sort—she was simply a lady's maid."

"What was her name?"

"Florine, if I remember rightly. She was waiting maid to his aunt at St. Germain's."

"He did love me then!" thought the marquise, starting violently with the suddenness of the unexpected confirmation.

"What is the matter, madame?" inquired the chevalier, perceiving the movement.

"Nothing—only a bone that came near going the wrong way. Did you ever hear him say if this girl was pretty?"

"O, yes; I have seen her myself, and I fancy she resembles you, only your complexion is fairer, and your cheek more beautifully dimpled."

"But if, as you say, he loved her, why were they not married?"

"His aunt obliged him to quit St. Germain's, and afterwards wrote him that his Florine had eloped to England with an officer of dragoons."

"(The old vixen! O! I shall choke with rage—I know I shall.)"

"Of course this news made my master very unhappy. He at once resolved to forget her, and accordingly plunged into all the dissipations Paris afforded. But what a lucky escape for him—was it not, madame? Just think of a fine, handsome fellow marrying a woman who could behave in that style."

"(England! Officer! Dragoons!) I feel as if I should choke."

"Choke?—no, don't. Wash it down with this," and quickly pouring out a glass of wine, he handed it to her.

"There, I am better now, Francois."

"Would you believe it, madame, my master never took luncheon without me."

"Humph! (I can readily believe it.) Perhaps you would like to continue the practice in your new quarters?"

"To speak honestly, I am dying with hunger. Nothing would afford me greater pleasure."

"Sit down then," said the marquise, laughing. "You must consider yourself highly flattered by this honor. It is not every valet who is so favored as to lunch with his mistress."

"Believe me, madame, I do feel honored, and I attribute it to the most eccentric of condescensions—leaving kindness out of the question."

"You possess penetration, I perceive."

"It is a habit I caught from my master, madame."

"(Pretty egotism, I declare.) There, there; you have eaten enough for this time."

"I assure you I have but just begun."

"It will make me desolate to see you eat more at this moment;" and the marquise threw herself on a couch. "Francois, place this cushion under my feet, and bathe my head with rose water."

The obedient chevalier took a bottle from the toilette table, and prepared to comply with her request.

"No, lavender." He changed the bottle with perfect composure. "No, orange water—no, millefleur—no, violet; there, I don't know what I want." And she threw her head back on the couch, fanning herself violently.

"(She is capricious as a swarm of humming-birds, and changeable as a weather-cock.)"

"Francois, what are you muttering there to yourself? Place this cushion under my feet."

He placed the cushion on the floor, and the marquise rested her feet coquettishly upon it, arranging her dress so as to display them to the best advantage. Very pretty feet they were too, and good right had the lady to be vain of them.

"There, that will do," she pronounced, having satisfied herself that the position was all that could be desired.

St. Real looked admiringly at them, and finally knelt beside the lounge to examine them at his ease.

"Pardon, madame," he said, "but your feet are so tiny and exquisite, that I quite wish I were one of the little blue slippers that are so favored as to encase them."

"Francois," cried madame, with affected anger, "you are growing presumptuous."

"That's another habit I caught from my master. He never sees a beautiful woman, but he revels in a sea of compliments; and in that respect I strikingly resemble him."

"(That's no great wonder.)"

"Madame, you assert that I am presumptuous. After all the livery is but the covering of the man. Is it merely because you are a marquise, that you are pretty? Who knows but that it is precisely because you are pretty, that you are a marquise?"

"Is he about to declare himself?" thought the expectant beauty.

"Marquise or not," St. Real earnestly continued, "I but see in you a woman—a pretty, amiable, coquettish, spoiled woman. I will confess, then, yes, if I perish for my boldness,

I love you with all my soul. Behold—you see at your feet, not your valet, but your slave!"

Thus saying, the chevalier threw himself before her, and taking a hand which was only matched by her other charms, covered it with kisses.

"Why does he not reveal himself?" the marquise impatiently interrogated of herself.

At this highly interesting juncture, the Baron de Sergy, entering, perceived the chevalier in this lover-like attitude. Consternation held him spell-bound for a moment; he then exclaimed:

"The deuce! Here, fellow! is that the way you follow my instructions?"

"Remember, monsieur, disparaging remarks upon me are a criticism on the taste of the marquise," coolly remarked St. Real, who had risen with due deliberation at the advent of this unexpected and perhaps unwelcome visitor.

"Baron, you are a bore," was the comment of the lady. "Francois was amusing me so pleasantly."

"Yes, monsieur, I was relating a fairy legend to madame."

"Ah, yes! I know all about these fairy legends, as you call them," cried the baron, with impotent fury. "Leave the room," he continued, addressing St. Real, and striding tempestuously about the apartment.

"Ha, ha! how excessively amusing," laughed madame. ("Now to put my scheme in practice for trying the courage of my gallant chevalier.") And with a fresh burst of merriment, she glided from the room.

After several angry perambulations, the baron became aware of the presence of St. Real.

"How, fellow! are you not gone?" he thundered.

"There is no necessity, monsieur, to exert yourself thus; my hearing is excellent."

"Will you quit this room, sirrah?"

"Quit, indeed! I should think not. I have promoted myself."

"To what position, may I ask?" the nobleman sarcastically inquired.

"Certainly. To prince regent of the establishment, and knight commander of this boudoir."

During this reply, he commenced arranging the articles on the tables, placing chairs, etc.

"His impertinence absolutely chills me!" gasped the baron.

"By-the-by, Monsieur le Baron—do you take snuff? Perhaps you will oblige me with your box."

"Fellow!" cried De Sergy, livid with indignation.

"I dropped mine in the river this morning," quietly continued St. Real, unheeding the flattering expletive. "Confound the thing! it was a present from my late master. It had a double lid—on the outside a painting of a madonna, and within, two lovers exchanging kisses by moonlight. Charming antithesis, eh?"

"Leave the room, knave."

"Impossible, I assure you. Madame's orders were that I should remain." He began humming a tune carelessly.

"Stop your singing, instantly."

"With pleasure," responded the chevalier, striking up a lively whistle.

"Insult me further, varlet, and I'll—"

"Are you fond of Terpsichore?" inquired our hero, dancing a few steps of the Minuet de la Cœur. "Perhaps you will join me in a minuet?"

"I'll minuet my cane about your back."

"Indeed? I strongly recommend you to do nothing of the sort. It is an old saying—'Two of a trade rarely agree.'"

"How, fellow!" But words being inadequate to express his sentiments, the baron hotly pursued St. Real round the room with uplifted cane—the latter using his arm to parry the blows, and finally dealing his antagonist a sound slap on the cheek. "A blow!" exclaimed De Sergy, thunderstricken. "Sacre Dieu! In ten minutes time, you shall hear from me." And he was rushing hastily away.

"How—a duel?" cried St. Real. "Ten or twenty minutes—it is the same to me."

"A duel—with a valet? No, fellow; I shall summon the guard."

"He has me in his power," said the chevalier, in an undertone. "I have assaulted him. The Bastille seems doomed to receive me. I had better claim the protection my rank affords, than be ignominiously dragged to prison."

"I'll teach you to assault your superiors."

"Baron de Sergy, I am your equal."

"How?"

"Instead of being Francois the valet, I am the Chevalier St. Real."

"Pooh, pooh! that's a likely story. This is the dress of a chevalier? O, yes; of course—"

"I tell you, baron, I am in disguise."

"And why in disguise? Why do you attempt to dupe me with your mean disguises?"

"Well, then, I will own to you that at the fete at Mousseaux, last night, I hit Madame de Perabere by mistake in the dark."

"You seem to be an adept at that sort of thing," said the baron, ruefully, rubbing his face. "However, sir, now that I know whom I am dealing with, we'll settle the conditions of the combat."

"You mean that one of us must die, unless apologies—"

"Of the most profound and humble character are offered—"

"Without witnesses?"

"Yes."

"Very good. Then apologize to me for using your cane, and I'll forgive you. Duels are so stupidly inconsistent."

"Come, I like your coolness. It is you who should offer an apology, not I."

"What an original idea! I understand it that you should be the apologist. Come, now—listen to reason."

"Listen to— I tell you it is I who must receive the apology."

"Baron, I did think you were more clear-headed; but we shall be compelled, I see."

"To fight, after all, Chevalier St. Real," cried the baron, angrily.

At this moment Nicol entering, announced "Madame Perabore," and retired. The lady was dressed in a riding-habit, a cap, with a rich plume waving down on her shoulder, whip in hand, and a little velvet mask, according to the fashion of the times, covering her face.

At her entrance, both gentlemen had mechanically repeated Nicol's announcement in amazement; and St. Real, reflecting that after his recent confession to De Sergy, "discretion was the better part of valor," concluded to make a quiet retreat. As he was stealing toward the door for this purpose, the lady flourished her whip, and intercepted him, saying:

"Wait, young man. Which of you two is named Francois?"

"What a question to ask me?" said the baron, contemptuously, in an undertone.

"I have his description," she continued, consulting her tablets. "I see it is you," turning to the seeming lacquey. "You are the Chevalier St. Real in disguise. You will perceive I am not a woman to be trifled with."

"Denial is useless," replied St. Real, bowing. I am—"

"Perfectly," replied the lady, cutting short his avowal of identity; "besides, it saves time. Remain here, M. le Baron," she continued, addressing De Sergy, who was retiring. "Remain here—this is an affair of honor, and you will serve as a witness."

"A witness!"

"You may be aware, chevalier," turning to St. Real, "that a gentleman has very recently insulted a lady grossly. You happen to be the gentleman, I am the lady—"

"Believe me, madame—"

"Not a word; one syllable to the Regent, and your head would have paid for the indiscretion. That, however, is not my mode of procedure. I consider it useless to entrust to others what can be accomplished by one's self."

"Then, madame, you desire—"

"Satisfaction for the outrage you committed last night. A trifle will satisfy me."

"Name it, madame."

"Your life," with great determination.

"I have every desire in the world to gratify you, madame; but, unfortunately, what you set so small a value upon, is highly important to me. I cannot, therefore, yield it without resistance."

"I have no inclination to fell you at one blow.

A duel is the better plan."

"Fight with a lady!"

"O, give yourself no anxiety on that score. You will find me a match for a man."

"I am overwhelmed by the honor you design for me, but I really am afraid of hurting you."

"Don't be alarmed, I beg. If it will heighten your confidence in me, allow me to inform you that I studied under St. George; and Madame Villars, the heroine of that famous duel with the Marquise de Nesle, is my pupil. I may also as well tell you that this very morning I pinked her three times, after having disarmed Madame Polignac, who possesses the steadiest nerves and the quickest eye in the kingdom."

As the fair Amazon concluded, she clapped her hands, and Nicol entered with two swords, one of which she took.

"My feelings have undergone a change," remarked the chevalier; "your account has forcibly impressed me. Suppose you kill me?"

"I confidently count on so doing," replied his antagonist, carelessly flourishing his sword.

"But permit me to argue—"

"Argue!" sneered the lady. "I fear I have made a mistake. Your reluctance shows you to be only a lacquey, and not the Chevalier St. Real."

"A lacquey!" cried the chevalier, bitterly.

"Yes, yes, madame; he endeavored to persuade me that he is that gentleman, but his cowardice proves the falsehood," said De Sergy.

"You are right, baron; it does, indeed. Ha, ha! and I wished to fight this drudge!"

"Ha, ha! a pretty impostor!"

"Drudge! impostor!" muttered St. Real, with flashing eyes.

"I'll work him up to it yet," thought the enraged fair one, marking his agitation. Then aloud—"You must have been terribly frightened, my poor fellow."

"Come on, madame!" cried the chevalier, seizing the remaining sword from Nicoli, who hastily quitted the room. "Come on, I don't wish your pity."

"(At last, it is well.) Guard!"

A short and spirited contest ensued. St. Real then obliged her to retreat.

"You will perceive, madame, that I am not a lacquey, but a gentleman."

"On my honor, he fights very well," admitted the lady, stopping to recover from exhaustion.

They resumed the conflict, and St. Real disarmed her.

"Ah!" she cried, falling on to a seat. "If I had any doubts of his courage, I am now sufficiently satisfied. What strength you possess!"

"A woman cannot fairly test it. The baron shall now develop it still further."

And advancing to De Sergy, he forced a sword into his shrinking hand.

"Eh! fight?" cried the latter, retreating. "No, no—thank you. I'll be content with an apology."

"Never! Come, don't waste the time."

"Then I'll make you one."

"I refuse to receive it. Defend yourself, or I'll impale you on the spot."

"Bravo! bravo! Ha, ha!" cried madame, applauding.

St. Real now fought the baron, who defended himself clumsily, and when the chevalier at length pinked him on the shoulder, he exclaimed: "Enough, enough! I'm wounded!"

"Then honor is satisfied," said St. Real, wiping his sword, "and I know you for a miserable coward. Will you deign, madame," advancing to the lady, "to forgive that blow given by mistake?"

"You are fully forgiven," she replied, taking off her mask, and revealing the features of his ci-devant mistress.

"My aunt!"

"The marquise!" exclaimed both gentlemen, simultaneously.

"Yes, chevalier, the marquise now, but once that same little Florine of whom you spoke to-day."

"Is it possible that the Marquise de Corandeuil is the identical Florine I loved at St. Germain?"

"The very one," said madame, playfully, "with additions and improvements too numerous to specify."

"It is like a wild dream. And how concerning that officer of dragoons and England?"

"All a malicious invention of your aunt to drive me out of your mind."

"Instead of which, it almost drove me out of my own. But tell me of that blow the other night; I am still in the dark."

"I was the recipient."

"Ten thousand pardons, dearest Flora, for so I shall now call you. The baron has been so kind as to take me into his confidence and relate the circumstances of your marriage, and I am aware you are now the most charming of widows."

"But she need not be so any longer—I offer her my hand," eagerly interposed De Sergy.

"Take care you don't get my foot in exchange," retorted St. Real, flinging the money offered as presents at De Sergy. "There are your bribes, old man."

"And do you love the marquise as you once did Florine?"

"With my entire soul; and singular as it may appear, it strikes me that I am greatly indebted to that very blow last evening; for it has restored my lost Florine to my arms."

"But, aunt, you are not going to marry this man?"

"Whom you yourself presented. You will be more careful in future, I trust, in the selection of your servants, lest in offering me a pebble, you find it proves a pearl. As for you, chevalier, I will only say that I've no wish to be severe upon what, after all, was but a striking proof of your regards. And, since by such an ingenious method you discovered me, we'll agree to call it a lucky hit, and let the matter pass."

GATHERING FRUIT BY MACHINERY.

William Doty, of South Hartford, N. Y., has invented an apparatus for gathering and sorting apples. The apples are shaken from the tree by a pole made to grasp the limb. As they fall, they are caught by an inclined cloth, stretched on a frame, through an opening in which they pass to a grating that retains the larger apples, which are drawn through a spout into bags or barrels. The smaller apples drop gently on a lower grating—through which the sticks, leaves and other foreign substances can pass and allow the apples to roll down a spout. Should the apple not be very regular in its form, it will not roll from the grating, but will stay upon it to be removed by hand; thus the apparatus will only deliver such apples as are marketable, and divide them into sizes fit for the same. This invention will interest our fruit cultivators, as it is one of the most difficult of things to gather apples so as to have them fit for long keeping.—Rural New Yorker.

SUMMER DREAMS.

BY MRS. DELIA E. CADWELL.

The summer is here, and I'm dreaming
Of a little brown cot far away,
That stands where the apple tree's branches
With sunbeams are ever at play.
Where the clambering vines full of blossoms
Have covered each window and door,
And the breeze rustles softly among them,
Or plays on the white sanded floor.

I hear the low murmur of waters,—
'Tis the brook in the shadowy vale,
That forever to listening pebbles
Is telling its musical tale.
The busy bees hum low and drowsy,
As they nestle the roses among;
And the bird by its home in the lilac,
Is teaching its nestling a song.

The fragrance of white clover blossoms
Comes up from each meadow and lee,
And the orchard so deep clothed in shadow,
Is cool as a grotto could be.
The sky there was always far bluer
My childish eye rested upon;
And the clouds intermixed with the azure
Were white as the breast of a swan.

Alas! that so sunny a picture
Should be clouded by sadness or care;
Yet tell me, O, summer breeze, tell me,
Do the dear ones I left linger there?
Can their bowed forms be seen in the garden,
Or out on the dim, dusty way?
Are they still sitting down by the hearthstone,
Or through the green lane do they stray?

And the summer breeze sighs as it murmurs,
"Ah, long, weary miles have I flown,
To tell you both forms from the cottage
With heavy hearts long since have gone!
For one to the churchyard was carried,
With death's silent seal on his brow,
And the other went forth among strangers,
I cannot tell where she is now!

I have traversed the mountain and valley,
To bring you a breath of the flowers,
Though no kind hand is left there to train them
Like that of the long ago hours!
The bee from the red rose's bosom
Its surfeit of sweetness still takes,
And the chirp of the bird by the window
The dreary monotony breaks!

The brook ripples on—but more softly,
The meadow is fragrant and green,
And the clouds in the sky are as snowy,
The riftings of azure between!
But I've found you afar from the roof-tree,
In this dusty and busy old town,
To say, those you loved, and who loved you,
From the cottage forever have gone!"

In all countries where nature does the most, man does the least; and where she does but little, there we shall find the utmost acme of human exertion.

THE PRIZE PICTURE.

BY ANNA M. CARTER.

"How dare you insult me, Charles, by mentioning such a thing? I ever give my consent to your marriage with Adrianna Seroni! You know better. Do you think I am insane? Answer, do you think I am insane?"

"No, sir, but—"

"I wish for no remarks. There is insanity somewhere, and if it isn't me it must be you."

"I wish to say—"

"Say nothing. I am speaking. Let's consider the state of the case. You, Carlos Cas-talez, only son of the wealthy, proud Don Pedro Castalez, wish to marry Adrianna Seroni, only daughter of old Pietro Seroni, the beggarly maccaroni vender. Pretty good. Pretty good. I have stated it fairly, have I not?"

"Yes, sir, you have understood me perfectly."

"Now, you wish my answer?"

"Yes, sir."

"Are you impatient?"

"Only moderately so."

"Glad to hear it. Here is my answer. By the Holy Virgin, I'll disown, disinherit you if you marry her."

"It is my present intention to do so."

"Then, it is my present intention to disinherit, curse you. By—"

"Stay, sir! withhold your curse till the right time. It is a bitter, fearful thing to incur a father's curse. If you can show me any good, solid reason why I should not marry her I will give her up."

"Well spoken, Charles. You are not as insane as I thought for."

"Remember, sir; unless you can prove to me that she is wanting in principle and proper maiden modesty, I hold the same mind, for I love her."

"Fool! Have you ever spoken to her?"

"Never, save to wish her good day as I passed her on the stairs or in the hall."

"Then you cannot say you love her. No man can love a woman save he knows her voice, has hung enraptured on her words, has touched her hand. But to business. I have many objections to set before you. She is poor, of low family—a char-woman by necessity. Why, man, the idea is preposterous! My son marry a charwoman! Tush! the boy's demented."

"You have told me nothing I didn't know before. My resolve is taken. I shall win her if I can, for though I have never conversed with her
I have heard her voice and know her well."

"Go your ways, but I tell you look to me for—"

"Hush, father, that is her step. Your picture looks finely, sir;" and when the door opened Charles Castalez was sitting looking admiringly at a large picture resting on an easel, while Don Castalez busied himself with arranging the paints upon his palette.

The door opened, admitting the figure of a young girl, beautiful as a picture, and almost like a picture she looked as she stood for a moment waiting in the doorway undecided whether to enter or not. Her figure was tall and slender, though exquisitely proportioned, and her face was perfectly beautiful, a face that once seen would never be forgotten, would be remembered for years in dreams like an angel's. At a signal from Don Castalez, Adrianna Seroni entered the room and began her customary duties of arranging the room, which she did neatly and skilfully. Charles Castalez lingered for a little while apparently utterly regardless of the young girl, but the large mirror over the mantel-piece reflected every motion, every change of feature, then sauntered slowly from the room. When he was gone, Adrianna seated herself on a low stool beside her master, and busied herself with grinding the colors for the painter. She ground patiently, but her eyes were constantly fixed upon the growing picture before her. Thus two hours passed away. Adrianna's task at last ended, she rose to go. As she laid her hand upon the door, Don Castalez spoke:

"I wish to speak a word to you. Here is what I owe you, and from to-day I shall need you no longer. You have been faithful, and I dislike to part with you. If in time to come I can aid you to obtain another situation I will do so."

The young girl turned pale as the painter spoke, but took the money extended to her, and with murmured thanks left the room and the house.

"What ails you, child?" asked old Pietro Seroni, as with slow, spiritless step, Adrianna entered their humble dwelling. The girl looked up with a sad smile and attempted to answer cheerfully, though her eyes filled with tears as she said:

"Nothing much, dear father. Don Castalez does not need my services—I am discharged. Now I must, till something else is found to do, be a burden upon you."

"Never mind that, dear child. We can get along nicely. Now let's think of something else. If ill luck came to you, good luck has come to me. I have let the little attic."

"Let the attic, father?"

"Yes, yes. Call you not that good luck?"

"Surely. But who has hired it? I am curious to know, dear father."

"Sit down to your supper, dear child, and I'll tell you. I have let it to a young man, a well-favored fellow—an artist I think he said he was."

"An artist, father!" and the young girl looked up with a beaming face. "Then I am not wholly wretched, for I can sometimes catch a glimpse of a picture."

"Silly child! Sometimes? Every day, for you are to take charge of his room. Your face brightens now, Adrianna. Your heart is light—keep it so, child."

Together the father and daughter sat conversing till the warm, golden twilight faded, and the city sunk to rest. Then they also sought their pillows—old Pietro to sink into a deep slumber, but Adrianna laid awake, weaving visions of future happiness. Adrianna had a soul for art, an eye for color, and her greatest aim, ambition for the future, was to learn to paint. The walls of her little white-washed room bore evidence of her genius. Every stray piece of paper was covered with sketches, landscape and figures.

With the dawn Adrianna rose, her heart throbbing with impatience to begin her new duties; and in justice to her, be it said, that no thought of the artist mingled with her desire, she wished only to look on the pictures. Adrianna had cleared away the remains of their frugal breakfast and arranged the little room neatly, and taking her sewing seated herself at the little lattice, when she started at hearing a knock at the door, a sound very rarely heard there, for the daughter of Pietro, the macaroni seller, had few visitors. With a slight feeling of nervousness, she arose and opened the door. Before her stood a young man, dressed very coarsely, but with infinite neatness. The young man removed his hat with great respect, and anxious to relieve the embarrassment he saw the girl labored under, spoke:

"I was told that signora would be at my service to help me in the management of my room. If not engaged, I would like to avail myself of her assistance now."

"I am ready directly," and with a light step the young girl followed her lodger up stairs. The room was scantily furnished, but heaped on the floor lay a confused mass of things—tin easels, palettes, frames, casts, canvasses and sundry other things necessary to the artist. With singular grace, dexterity and cheerfulness, Adrianna began to put the room in order, the young man, Henri Calotin, merely looking on or giving ing directions where certain things should be placed. With her eyes drinking in everything, Adrianna labored. As she unpacked picture after picture, and hung them on the little low walls, her eye sparkled, but when Henri Calotin, opening a case, gave into her hands a beautiful gem by Raphael, she could not repress an exclamation of admiration. The young man addressed some conversation to her then for the first time.

"You are fond of pictures?"

"Yes, signor."

"Have you seen many?"

"Not very many. For nearly a year I performed for Don Castalez the same services I am to render you. He had a number of pictures."

"Yes, yes, I know that don. He paints but indifferently well. Among those pictures on the left is one of his. Can you, think you, tell me which?"

Adrianna paused a moment, then with a deep blush, pointed to a small sunset scene, saying modestly, "I am but a poor, uneducated girl, but I think I know his color and touch."

"You are right. You have a correct eye. Now tell me, signora, which you consider the finest of all these pictures here."

Without a moment's hesitation, Adrianna turned towards the young man the gem of Raphael's, which she still held in her hand. The young man smiled, and after a few casual remarks, allowed the young girl to go her ways.

With a light step and beating heart Adrianna descended the little narrow stairs. She had seen a gem by Raphael. In her heart lived the beautiful little picture, scarcely more than a study, still beautiful in grace and coloring. With face flushed and head bent down, Adrianna drew, and very many artists now would be proud of her quick touch and accurate memory.

Day after day rolled by and Adrianna dwelt in her world of pictures. The new lodger proved himself a modest, unassuming person, apparently intent only on his art. One day coming suddenly back to his room, he found Adrianna seated in rapt attention before a picture, while a piece of paper in her lap attested the fact that fingers as well as eyes had been busy. The young girl rose in the utmost confusion when Henri entered. He pitied her embarrassment, and to give her time to recover her self-possession, the young man stooped and picked up the picture or sketch, which in her sudden rising, she had allowed to fall on the floor unheeded. No sooner did his eyes rest upon the paper than he exclaimed:

"Who drew this?"

"I did, signor. I meant not to have it seen.

Please forgive the liberty I took in copying your picture."

"Signora Adrianna—" and he paused, while the girl, misunderstanding the cause of the stop, hastened to say:

"Pardon me. Let the beauty and grace of the picture be my excuse for my presumption."

"O, you understand not my meaning. My pause was one of astonishment not displeasure. You shall be an artist. In this rough sketch there is skill and genius."

"O, signor, you laugh at me."

"Upon my honor, no. Where learned you to draw so boldly and well?"

"In my own room."

"Who was your teacher?"

"I had none. At night I have endeavored to draw from memory such pictures as I saw in the day time."

"You have more, then?"

"Yes, signor."

"Go bring them to me instantly. I must see them."

Wondering at the young man's manner, but still obedient, Adrianna soon placed before the young artist the little rough sketches she had made from time to time. Henri Calotin's eyes grew bright with wonder as he gazed at the unmistakable proofs of more than ordinary talent. Adrianna watched with a beating heart the face of the young artist. At last he raised his head and spoke:

"Would you like to become an artist, Adrianna?" 'Twas the first time that he had ever called her by her Christian name, and that, together with the question, thrilled to her heart. She paused, and the question was repeated.

"I should like it," answered the young girl, trembling with delight.

"You shall. I will teach you."

"You, signor?"

"Yes, yes. All I can will I teach you."

"You forget, signor, that we are very poor."

"I do not forget it. But that has nothing to do with the subject."

"Ah, Signor Calotin, it has more than you think. Gladly would I become your pupil but I cannot, for there is no money to pay for the lessons." And as Adrianna spoke her heart beat heavily with the thought that the glorious idea must be given up.

"Foolish girl, I ask no money. I will gladly teach you; proud to be the means of improving the wonderful talents God has given to you—talents, Adrianna, which many an artist here in this good city of Florence would be glad to possess."

So it was settled, and Adrianna became a pupil of Henri Calotin—ay, a pupil who learned two lessons at once. Many an hour did the two paint side by side, Adrianna catching every suggestion with eagerness, and in an incredibly short space of time she equalled her master. Soon Adrianna learned what was not taught her—to love her master. Yes, the truth dawned upon her to her despair. One day Henri Calotin came not to his studio, for the little attic was used only for that purpose—he lodged elsewhere. The non-appearance of her master opened the eyes of the young girl. She knew then that love had crept into her heart unawares. For a long time, Adrianna sat that day, revolving upon the course to pursue. The only one before her was a painful one, but with a firm, though aching heart, she resolved to follow that one, cost what it might. Late in the afternoon Henri Calotin appeared and summoned his pupil to take her accustomed lesson, and was surprised to find that Adrianna obeyed with a faltering step and downcast eyes. The lesson was got through with slowly and sadly. Henri wondered at the want of interest in the hitherto enthusiastic pupil, and the pupil herself painted on, dreading the close. It came at last, and as she laid aside her brushes, Adrianna spoke, and her voice though low was firm:

"Signor Calotin, I must now thank you for your kind instruction. Earnestly I wish it was in my power to repay you for your invaluable instruction, given so very kindly and cheerfully to a poor girl."

She paused and Henri looked up in wonder—wonder at the young girl's words and the grave manner, so different from her former light, merry tone.

"Adrianna has something more to say. Perhaps you are tired of my instructions?"

"No."

"Ah! I have it. You see that I can teach you but little more. You are desirous of seeking a better master."

Adrianna's eyes filled with tears at the unmerited suspicion, but, making a violent effort, she controlled her feelings while she said, in a tone rendered hard and cold by the struggle:

"Signor Calotin is unjust though right in one thing, which is, that these lessons must cease."

"Wherefore?"

"The reason, pardon my seeming rudeness, I must reserve for myself. 'Tis neither because I am wearied with the lessons nor desire a better master."

"Then why, Adrianna, give them up?" The question was asked in a gentle, pleading tone, which broke down the seeming coldness Adrian-na had guarded herself with. Her eyes filled with tears and her lips trembled, though by a violent effort the tears were held back and the voice kept firm.

"Do not ask my reasons. I cannot give them, but I must give up my lessons. Heaven bless you for your kindness. Farewell."

And as if daring to trust herself no further, Adrianna was about to leave the room hastily, when her steps were arrested. A hand was laid gently and firmly on her arm, and one word was spoken which thrilled her very heart.

"Adrianna!"

The girl paused, raised her eyes to the face of her young master, then covered her own face with her hands.

"Before you go away, Adrianna, you must hear me. You take with you all the sunshine. I love you and cannot live without you. Adrianna, Adrianna, I love you—I love you. Will you not stay by me? Will you not be my wife? Adrianna, before you is the door—if you walk through it, I will read it as a sign that my hopes are vain; if you stay, you are mine. There is the door—go."

"I would rather stay."

The words came low and timidly, and a deep blush overspread her face and neck.

"Blessings rest on you, my darling Adrianna!" And in a moment more she was clasped in the arms of Henri—held fast and kissed repeatedly.

The lessons went on uninterruptedly from that hour; and many times did Henri raise his eyes from the canvass, to watch the beautiful girl as she sat painting beside him.

"Ah! Adrianna, dearest, I've been to the exhibition to day," said Henri, entering the room where Adrianna sat busily sewing. The girl raised her head and a bright smile spread over her face.

"Were you pleased, Henri?" she asked, while her lover took a seat beside her.

"Pleased? It is glorious. I only got in by chance. Met Don Castalez, who insisted upon my accompanying him. To-morrow, dearest, you must go. The collection is very fine, but the gem of the whole is a beautiful head—Faith—No. 508. The artist's name is not put down in the catalogue. You will admire it."

"Perhaps not," answered Adrianna, with a bright smile.

"You'll have to, for it is too exquisite. To-morrow, darling, you may see and judge for yourself."

To-morrow came, and with a beating, throlbing heart, Adrianna went to the exhibition. It fully realized her expectations. Hall upon hall was filled with a collection of the choicest pictures which could be procured. Before the picture of Faith, Adrianna paused. There was nothing about the picture to strike the attention. It was simply a female head, and part of the figure, just the shoulders and bust. The face was exquisite in color and expression. The hair fell in careless waves over the shoulders. The picture once looked at, had to be studied, to be gazed at again and again. Around the picture stood a number of people, most of them connoisseurs in art, and various were the comments which Adrianna listened to.

"Henri, I rather like the picture, but I want to examine that Galettea. I've looked at this enough." And so speaking, the young girl walked away, and soon went home.

The next day, Adrianna and Henri were sitting together by the open window. Old Pietro Seroni entered the room with a paper in his hand.

"Well, well, my young artists. The judgment has passed and the prize has been awarded."

"To whom?" asked both the young people.

"To the one who painted the head called Faith—No. 508—name as yet unknown."

"Henri!"

That was the only sound—a sort of cry, and to the utmost horror of both men, Adrianna sank, fainting on the floor. Tenderly, Henri Calotin raised his fainting bride, bore her to her chamber, and, together with her father, used all the means in their power to restore Adrianna to her senses. Their efforts were successful, and soon she was sitting up in bed speaking.

"What was it, Adrianna, which caused you to faint?" tenderly asked Henri.

"Yes, my daughter, what was it? a sudden pain?"

"No, a sudden joy—joy too great to think of. Listen—I painted the head of Faith, which has drawn the prize."

"You!" exclaimed old Pietro Seroni.

"You!" reiterated Henri, dropping the little hands he held.

"Yes. I painted it. To you, dear Henri, all credit is due. O, how can I ever thank you—but for you this had never been—never been."

"Nay, dearest, no praise for me. Your own genius has brought you to this."

Not many hours passed before all Florence rung with the wonderful story. The picture deemed worthy of the prize by all the learned academicians, was painted by Adrianna Seroni, daughter of old Pietro Seroni, macaroni vender! Was ever heard so strange a story? In one short day the young girl was raised from obscurity to the pinnacle of fame, sought afar and courted by all the nobles of the land. Crowds of artists and wealthy citizens thronged to the door of the hitherto almost deserted dwelling. Invitations of all kinds besieged the young girl, but one only was instantly replied to. That was from her old patron and master. Adrianna sought his studio as requested.

A warm welcome awaited her from both father and son, who were together in the room.

"I have sent for you, Signora Seroni," said the old man, "to ask you to look with favor upon the suit of my son, who loves you—who loved you when you were my little maid, known only as the daughter of the macaroni seller."

"Yes, signora," and the young man stepped forward—"I love you, and—"

"Pardon me, my lords," said Adrianna, while she looked with dignity at the gentlemen before her, "I cannot listen to such words. I came here as requested, because I wished to thank don Castalez for the instruction I gained while with him. I—"

"I gave you none," hastily interrupted the old man.

"You gave me no lessons, Don Castalez, but here in your studio watching you I first learned to draw and paint—from observation and from the remarks made to others I received my instruction."

"Why scorn my son's suit?" abruptly asked the painter.

"Because for many months I have been betrothed to one Henri Calotin."

"Is he wealthy?" asked young Castalez, eagerly.

"Is he noble?" as eagerly asked the father.

"Neither the one nor the other," answered the young girl.

"Reflect, child," said Don Castalez. "My son offers you rank and wealth. Break the base bonds made in your obscurity. Become my son's bride."

"Signor, such language is unworthy you. I love Henri Calotin, and were he the veriest beggar in Florence, but honest and kind, I would marry him. What was I but day-before yesterday? Then, had your son asked my hand in honorable marriage, you would have cursed him."

The old man bit his lips as he listened to those words, uttered in a firm tone, and Charles Castalez, with a mortified air and low bow, left the room. Again Don Castalez spoke:

"You are mistaken. I plead for my son."

Just as he was speaking the door opened, and Henri Calotin walked in. With a bright smile

Adrianna welcomed him; then presented him to the old don. Throwing aside his slouched cap and pulling off a pair of whiskers, Henri Calotin, pressing an arm round the waist of the astonished girl, thus spoke:

"Adrianna, when you were in my father's studio I loved you. You left and my heart sank, but I determined to win you. You know the rest. I love you dearly, and am only sorry that fame and fortune came to you before you were my wedded wife, for you may think but for that I would have played you false."

"Hush! hush, Henri, your words pain me. I love and trust, and thank fortune that you bring not to your father's house an obscure, portionless bride."

MORMON TYRANNY.

The New York Times Utah correspondent writes as follows:—"I informed you a week ago that the Townsend House, opened as a hotel by its owner, had been suddenly closed by Brigham's order. Since then Heber C. Kimball has purchased the establishment and put an agent into it, under whose management it is in full blast. Townsend, who owned the property and several adjoining buildings, but had been fool enough to 'consecrate' it to the church, has been ordered away from the city for his temerity in opening it and taking Gentiles to board without Brigham's consent. You are already aware, I suppose, that when a Mormon 'consecrates' his property, he makes a regular deed of it to Brigham as (to use the accustomed phrase here), 'Trustee in trust for the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.' Thus he absolutely signs away all control over the property he has acquired, and becomes a beggar the moment he dares resist the despotic will of his priestly superior! Do you understand that these are solemn facts, incident to life in a Territory of the United States under the American Constitution, and in this nineteenth century?"

KIND WORDS.

They never blister the tongue or lips. And we have never heard of one mental trouble arising from this quarter. Though they do not cost much, yet they accomplish much. They help one's own good-nature and good will. Soft words soften our own soul. Angry words are fuel to the flame of wrath, and make the blaze more fierce. Kind words make other people good-natured. Cold words freeze people, and hot words scorch them, and bitter words make them bitter, and wrathful words make them wrathful. There is such a rush of all other kinds of words in our days, that it seems desirable to give kind words a chance among them. There are vain words, and idle words, and hasty words, and spiteful words, and empty words, and profane words, and warlike words. Kind words also produce their own image on men's souls. And a beautiful image it is. They soothe, and quiet, and comfort the hearer. They shame him out of his morose, unkind feelings.—Pascal.

THE VOICE OF JOSEPHINE.

BY M. REBECCA OSBORN.

"The first applause of the French people," said Napoleon, "sounded in my ears sweet as the voice of Josephine."

Sweet as the voice of Josephine,
When in her flute-like tone,
The gay and busy world shut out,
The song for him alone.
Or, when as evening hours drew nigh,
She graced the festive hall;
He heard the music of her voice
In common with them all.

Sweet as the voice of Josephine,
When she so swiftly sped
To some poor peasant's cot,
And soothed his dying bed.
Or, when at early, blushing morn,
She turned her thoughts above,
And breathed a holy prayer for him,
Her gentle heart's best love.

Sweet as the voice of Josephine,
The fond, forsaken wife,
The sharer of the joys and cares
And sorrows of his life.
Sweet as her voice, who in her worse
Than weary widowhood,
E'er spoke of him who wronged her so
As something pure and good.

O, cruel fate! that one so true,
So gifted, and so fair,
Must, in this selfish world of ours,
Such disappointments bear.
"And sad it is in grief like this,
O'er visions loved and lost,
The truest and the tenderest heart Must always suffer most."

THE WHITE QUEEN'S CASTLE.

BY DAVID A. HARRISON.

COUNT ALBERT CARMIOLO died very suddenly. There had been a grand hunt, a magnificent wild boar had been slain, and the exultant party came back to the grand old castle of Carmiolo, to devote the remainder of the day, and the whole of the night, to eating, and drinking the exquisite old wines with which Count Albert's cellar was stored. Wit and mirth had reached their height, wine flowed like water, and the spirits of all the company were high, when, seizing the huge, silver hunting cup, Count Albert rose to pledge the successful marksman, Count John Earnstein. A very handsome man was Count Albert, but a deep drinker, and one lost all sense of his beauty in disgust for the face now so inflamed. High he raised the massive goblet, but before he could utter a single word, a deadly paleness overspread his flushed face, the drinking cup dropped from his nerveless hand, and he fell forward with his face on the table, dead, without a groan. His horror-struck companions raised him up and strove to restore consciousness; but in vain. All was confusion in that banquet-hall, which a few minutes before was the scene of such wild revelry and unbounded license. Sadly the company bore the body to an inner chamber, and then left the house.

The Countess Carmiola was dead—dead long since—killed, it was reported, by the coldness and neglect of her husband, an imperious, bad-tempered man. She died, leaving one daughter, now about nineteen years old, who inherited all her mother's beauty and gentleness, with just enough of her father's haughty spirit to add piquancy to her manners. If Count Albert had been unkind to his wife, he could not be charged with treating his daughter, the lovely Lodoiska, in the same harsh manner, for to her he was kind and indulgent, and it was with wild despair that the girl heard of her father's sudden and awful death.

With all the pomp belonging to his rank, the remains of Count Albert Carmiola were laid to rest in the tomb of his ancestors, and with a sad heart, Lodoiska returned to her now desolate home, for her sole companion was her father's maiden sister, Annie Carmiola, a lady of uncertain age, and still more uncertain temper. During the life-time of Count Albert, his sister, who always made it her home with him, had little opportunity to give way to the haughty, imperious temper she possessed, and which, joined to insufferable pride and affectation, rendered her an unpleasant companion. Fearing her brother, she curbed her own haughty spirit, and appeared a quiet, rather silly woman. The count left a will, giving two-thirds of his property to his daughter, and the remaining third to his sister Annie, whom he appointed Lodoiska's guardian, until she should marry.

But a few months had passed since the melancholy death of the count, before Lodoiska felt the full weight of her aunt's imperious will. Wanting in beauty and fascination herself, Annie Carmiola could only look on her charming niece with jealous, envious eyes, and soon began to curtail her proper liberties. Almost like a nun the beautiful girl was kept—seeing very little company, rarely going out even to ride, unless accompanied by her detested aunt. Feeling the loss of her father very deeply, Lodoiska submitted quietly and uncomplainingly to the authority of her aunt—desiring only to be left to her painting, music and reading. So quietly had Lodoiska obeyed all commands and restrictions put upon her, that Annie Carmiola began to feel herself surely the mistress.

One day Lady Annie drew a chair beside that of her niece, and in a commanding voice, said:

"Lodoiska, you are to regard the Count Armand Kardozag as your future husband."

The words were abrupt, and the information they conveyed far from pleasing. The young girl raised her head with a sudden start.

"What did you say, Aunt Annie?"

"This day you will receive Count Armand Kardozag as your future husband."

"By whose authority?"

"By mine."

"Impossible," answered Lodoiska, quietly. And she resumed her embroidery as if the affair was settled beyond dispute.

Lady Annie looked at her niece with astonishment. Was it possible that she dared dispute her will? So astonished was she that she could not speak for a few seconds. At last, she found voice to say:

"Impossible? Impossible?"

"Yes, quite impossible. And now we will drop a subject quite unpleasant to me, if you please."

"I don't please, miss. I will have you understand that I do not recognize the impossibility. You will receive the count, as I informed you."

"I will not!"

"Diana!" exclaimed the infuriated woman. "I can scarcely credit my ears. You—will—receive—the—Count Kardozag—when—he—presents—himself!"

"I will receive him when he comes, but as to returning a favorable answer to his suit, I shall do no such thing. My answer will be a point blank refusal."

"You are not called upon, miss, to give any answer. I have given him my promise. You have only to receive him politely."

"Which I shall not do. How dare the low, depraved, debauched libertine and gambler to aspire to my hand?"

"Such terms, Lodoiska, applied to the man whom I have chosen for your future husband, are highly unbecoming and insulting, if not to him, to myself. I expect him every moment, so you may as well prepare to receive him calmly, and not show such evident and unmistakable signs of ill temper."

"I will show no ill-temper, as you call my just indignation, but a proper spirit. I have submitted too long to your impositions, and now, you have to learn that the daughter of Count Albert Carmiola possesses some of his spirit."

Lodoiska had scarcely done speaking, when a servant announced the Count Kardozag, and in a moment he was ushered in. Lady Annie rose to receive him, giving him a warm welcome, but Lodoiska, raising her head, bowed with chilling hauteur, and then resumed her work. With a quick, admonishing glance at her niece, the enraged aunt placed a chair for the count near her own and equally near that of Lodoiska. The count accepted the seat, and addressed the girl before him :

"Lady Lodoiska, your aunt, the amiable Lady Annie, an ornament to her sex, gives me to understand that you are ready and happy to see me to-day."

"As ready and as happy now as ever," was the ungracious reply, delivered in freezing tone and manner.

"Ah! eh!" ejaculated the count, struck by the haughty air of the girl. "You are sarcastic. How is this? Your aunt led me to believe that you looked with favorable eyes on my suit—nay, that all was positively settled." And the count rose in great rage.

"You are right—she does, she does," said the faithless woman, rising in her turn, and laying her hand on the count's arm. "Do not mind what she says, for the dear girl is in one of her odd fits when she speaks without thinking."

"Your pardon, aunt, and yours, too, sir count, if I contradict the statement just made. It is no mere whim that induces me to treat you as I have done. My aunt made you rash promises which she cannot fulfil."

"How is that, mixx? Remember I am your lawful guardian."

"That I know to my sorrow; but, thank Heaven, I can guard my own happiness, and in order to do so I respectfully, decidedly, refuse to listen to Count Kardozag's suit."

"Death and fiends!" exclaimed the count, springing towards the young girl as if he meant to seize her. "Dare you say that to my face, Lady Lodoiska?"

"Ay, and do not make me forget by your own actions the fact that I strive to shut my eyes upon, that I am dealing with one who can lay no claim to the title of gentleman."

Annie Carmiola did what Count Kardozag could scarcely refrain from doing—she seized the young girl rudely by the arm.

"Retract, Lodoiska, your unlady-like, insulting words, and receive the count as your future husband."

Quickly removing her aunt's hand from her arm, Lodoiska, drawing her tall form haughtily up, spoke coldly and deliberately, and as she did so the count acknowledged to himself her beauty, and felt more determined than ever to make her his own.

"Aunt, my answer is unchangeable. I refuse to have anything whatever to say to Count Kardozag, whom I neither like nor even respect, and consider that he does me an incalculable injury by proffering such a suit, when his base, unworthy character is so well known. I have nothing further to say, save that you, Count Kardozag, are at liberty, nay, are requested to retire, and if that request is not complied with on the instant, I shall summon a servant. No, to spare you that alternative, I retire myself, with the admonition that if ever you seek to enter this house again, on any pretext whatever, you will be turned from the door." And with the step of an empress the justly incensed girl walked from the apartment, leaving the plotters standing looking at each other in speechless rage.

A few minutes they stood thus, then seating themselves, they talked long and earnestly in whispers. The conference ended, Lady Annie hastily attiring herself, ordered her carriage, and accompanied by the base count, set off on some mission.

Lodoiska sat in her room, vainly striving to quell the angry and fearful thoughts that passed through her mind. She knew Count Kardozag as a bold, bad man, and her aunt for a vain, scheming woman, and now that she was alone, she felt that the affair was not so easily ended, and trembled with the thoughts of the misery her scornful, bitter words would probably occasion. Full well she felt that she had made an enemy of the count, and with a beating heart Lodoiska resigned herself to wait for the end, which was sooner in arriving than she thought for.

Three hours after the above related scene, Lady Annie Carmiola, with an exultant smile on her face, entered the room where, sad and apprehensive, Lodoiska sat, vainly endeavoring to fix her attention on a book before her.

"Now, rebellious girl, we shall see who will triumph!" And Lady Annie held a paper before the eyes of the poor girl. The seal caught her eye, and with pale lips, and her voice trembling in spite of herself, she asked :

"What have you there, aunt?"

"O, nothing much, only a command signed and sealed by Arch-duke John, compelling you to receive Count Armand Kardozag as your future husband. Your answer now, proud girl!"

"I must obey."

Lodoiska rose and left the room, to fling herself in an agony of tears upon her bed. But she was not a weak girl to sit and weep when anything was to be done. Springing up, she bathed her face with cold water and removed all traces of emotion from her face, then dressing herself in robes of elegant deep black, she left the room. At the parlor door she paused irresolute—then opened it.

"Aunt, after so much agitation, I need exercise. I go to ride." The door closed, and she muttered as she went down the stairs, "ay, I can try my power, too, and if I fail, I will leave my native land."

It is necessary to inform my readers that a few weeks before the events just narrated transpired, Lodoiska had plighted her faith to a handsome, noble-hearted young man, Count Victor Ernstein. This was a secret; for both felt that the hatred which Annie Carmiola bore the young count would lead her to do all in her power to separate them and destroy their happiness.

Sitting in his dining-hall was the Arch-duke John, of Austria. On the table before him was a chess-board and a huge, golden goblet filled to the brim with his favorite wine, the genial Johannisberger. Arch-duke John was a very singular, brave, and generous man—high-spirited and imperious, he at times governed with gentleness, but often with the sway of a despot. He was an inveterate chess-player—every leisure moment was devoted to the study and practice of the game. Indeed, one room of his palace was marked off in squares, and on that extensive board he played games, using human, living beings for chess men. A door opened, and the chamberlain informed the duke that a lady desired to speak with him on business of importance. Would she be admitted? The duke gave a sign of assent. The door closed and opened again in a few moments to admit a lady. When the door had again closed, and the lady found herself alone with the duke, she knelt before him.

"Lay aside your veil, which completely conceals your features. We like not to receive prayers or petitions from one afraid or ashamed to show her face," said the prince, gravely. With a gesture in which pride and fear were mingled, the veil was thrown back, disclosing the beautiful features of Lodoiska Carmiola. Prince John could scarcely repress a start of astonishment and admiration as he looked at the extraordinary beauty of the face before him.

"Ah, whom have we here?"

"A poor girl who asks for mercy and protection—Lodoiska Carmiola."

"The name methinks I have heard. Aha!

but now we gave a written order for your marriage. What brings you here, fair lady?"

"Despair!" And the beautiful head drooped.

"Like you not your future spouse? Methinks we heard you did."

"Nay, sire. A base, unprincipled man is Count Kardozag. I prefer death to a life with him."

"Is hatred for his character the sole reason for your disinclination to wed him?" And the duke bent his dark eyes upon the face before him.

A deep blush for a moment spread over the pale face of the girl, adding another charm, as she said:

"To you, my prince, may the truth be told, I love, and am betrothed to another—Count Victor Ernstein."

"We know him—a brave soldier and a faithful subject. I fear, Lady Lodoiska, you have come too late," said the arch-duke, in his perplexity laying aside the "we." Scarcely an hour ago I signed a paper enforcing your aunt's wishes.

"Alas, I know it. For the love of Heaven recall, annul it. Save me from such a fate!"

Prince John leaned back in his chair in deep thought. The sight of her distress troubled the really kind hearted duke. Suddenly he raised his head, while a smile spread over his face.

"I see it all now. I cannot take back my promise, but will half retract, and the matter shall be decided by a game of chess. Yes, yes, Duke Albert (Zortkow shall be my opponent, Count Kardozag shall be king of the red chessmen, your aunt the queen. You, Lodoiska, shall be queen of the white men, and your betrothed, Count Victor Ernstein, shall be your castle. In my chess-room with human beings I will play. If the red king be checkmated, you are free, if not—"

"God help me!" exclaimed the despairing Lodoiska, almost involuntarily.

The cry excited the rage of the imperious duke, who asked with a fierce scowl in his face:

"How—doubt you our skill? The game is ours, of course, and you are free to wed whomsoever you please. If we lose, you must abide by the command given to your aunt. We have decided. You may retire."

With a heavy heart, Lodoiska left the hall. Was this the prince so proud of his justice—to settle such a question by a petty game of chess, wherein one false move and all might be lost? There was nothing left but to wait patiently the issue of the game, praying to Heaven that the prince might be victorious.

All Vienna rung with the strange story. Few knew what the question was, but all knew that a question of great importance was to be settled by Arch-duke John by a game of chess, in which living human beings were to take the part of chess-men. The day before the one appointed for the singular game, Lodoiska sought an interview with Duke Czortkow. She was shown into an elegantly furnished apartment, and there the duke came to receive her.

"I am the Lady Lodoiska Carmiola, to decide whose fate you play a game of chess with Prince John."

"How can I serve you?"

"By playing as poorly as possible—by losing the game."

"That cannot be. Prince John knows that I play well, and should I fail in my usual skill, and give him an undue advantage, it would ruin all."

"The fame of your playing is spread through the kingdom, but the most skilful may make one false move. I will give you anything you ask, Duke Czortkow, if you will lose the game."

"All I ask?" said the duke, bending his eyes upon the bewitching girl before him.

"I said all you asked," haughtily answered the girl, rising, "trusting to your honor as a gentleman to ask nothing beyond my power to give."

"Well then, suppose I ask for yourself—your own fair self?"

One lightning glance, and Lodoiska walked proudly to the door. There she paused:

"The world speaks of Duke Czortkow as a gentleman. I know him now. Play the game as skilfully as you can, I neither expect nor wish anything from you."

She bowed and was gone. Had Lodoiska been witness to an interview between Duke Czortkow and Count Kardozag, she would have waited the end of the game. Duke Czortkow was a gambler, and the large sum of money offered him by his friend, Count Kardozag, made him anxious to win the game.

It was a bright though singular scene which the room in the palace presented. The strange floor marked off in squares of black and white. Thirty-two of these squares were occupied by people in rich dresses. The prince had played games before, but never with such great preparations. The figures were dressed like chess-men—one set in red, the other in white. Lodoiska looked very beautiful in her dress of white satin and velvet, and crown of diamonds and pearls, though her face was deadly pale. The game began, and was carried on in silence. At first, Lodoiska tried to follow the moves made by the figures, but at length she turned her face away, and lowered her eyes. To her it seemed a vast space of confusion, that chess-board—and she sighed to think that the eccentric prince had not chosen to decide it by a game played on a table with inanimate pieces of ivory. The peculiar game was for her interest, for the prince, accustomed to play on such a large scale, was never confused, while his opponent made several false moves. This Lodoiska knew not, and was blindly sent from one end of the board to the other. Hour after hour the game was carried on, till the poor chess-men were ready to sink with fatigue. Lodoiska was almost in a fainting condition, and leaning in a very unqueenly manner upon a knight who occupied the next square, when she was obliged to move. This she did mechanically, past minding how the game went, when a loud voice exclaimed exultantly:

"Checkmated!"

The game was decided then. With a wild glance, Lodoiska looked up and gasped out:

"Which king, red or white?"

"The red king."

Lodoiska heard the answer, and felt she was saved. Reaction followed, and she fainted from fatigue and anxiety. A long while she lay in deathlike stillness, almost as white as her dress; but recovering she saw Prince John and Victor Ernstein bending over her. As soon as she was able to sit up, the prince spoke to her.

"The game is finished, and the priest stands ready even now to unite you to the man of your choice, of whom we approve. In consideration of the pain and anxiety we have made you bear, in fatherly love and care we will take it upon us to give you away."

Banishing the natural shrinking she felt, fearing another misfortune, Lodoiska stood up, and in presence of the assembled knights and ladies she was made the wife of the handsome, brave Victor Ernstein. Prince John gave the bride away, and in later days smiled as he saw the beautiful woman and her husband the brightest ornaments at court, for he thought of the time when Victor Ernstein was the WHITE QUEEN'S CASTLE.

We talk of the intemperance of the poor; why, when we philosophically consider the crushing miseries that beset them—the keen suffering of penury, and the mockery of luxury and profusion with which it is surrounded—my wonder is, not that there are so many who purchase temporary oblivion of their misery, but that there are so few.—Jerrold.

LOVE.

Love never fails to master what he finds,
But works a different way in different minds:
The fool enlightens, and the wise he blinds.

DAVIDSON.

LUCRETIA.

BY M. POTTER, JR.

Dare I whisper, gentle Lu,
 May I tell thee what I feel?
 Will it give offence to you
 If my secret I reveal?
 It will not detain you long;
 Will you come aside with me?
 For 't is not amid the throng
 It should be told to thee.

Don't deny me, gentle Lu,
 'Tis a favor easily done;
 Confidence from friendship true
 You will not unkindly shun;
 And although you may surmise
 What this secret sweet will be,
 Still I trust you'll not despise,
 And coldly turn from me.

I will tell thee, gentle Lu,
 Of a feeling which has lain
 Dormant, till thy presence threw
 Round my heart its magic chain;
 When from wandering I returned
 And sought thy side again,
 How affection fondly yearned
 To speak—shall I refrain?

I have scrupled, gentle Lu,
 To unfold ambition's aim—
 Ambition, which, dear Lu,
 Seeks neither rank nor fame;
 Scruples that from love arise
 Have made me hesitate
 To raise to thee mine eyes,
 And learn from thine my fate.

THE HEART OF A QUEEN.

BY MARY W. JANVRIN.

"My fair Katherine!"

The whisper was clear and distinct which floated from behind the heavy tapestry hangings of a high, mullioned window, in a spacious chamber.

Lady Latimer started from her embroidery frame, and a flush broke up the clear paleness of her cheek. She dropped her embroidery needle and listened intently.

Again the whisper, this time more distinct and bold; and the window hangings were put aside by a white, jewelled hand, shaded by a deep ruff of costly lace, followed by the owner of that hand—a tall, haughty-looking, and handsome young chevalier.

"Sir Thomas!" exclaimed the lady, somewhat indignantly, while a frown gathered on her lovely brow and her small foot tapped the floor.

"Nay, be not angry, sweet Katherine!" pleaded the cavalier, advancing and respectfully kneeling, striving to lift the hand which lay on the folds of her robe of sable velvet—for Katherine Latimer, though young in years, wore for the second time the garb of widowhood—"frown not on your slave, sweet lady; turn not away the light of those sweet eyes. I have been groping in the dark since thou hast banished me from thy presence, and to-day could not resist the fraud to steal in here, where thou sittest alone, and thus gain audience which of late thou hast denied me. Why dost thou look so coldly on me, Katherine? In what have I lost thy favor?" And he pressed his bearded lip passionately to the hand he held.

Lady Latimer's very soul thrilled to the words and caresses of her noble lover; yet, while a spasm of mental agony contracted her features, she drew her hand suddenly from his and assumed an air of haughtiness, saying:

"Sir Thomas Seymour, since, in thus coming unannounced before me, you have failed to interpret rightly my silence and wish to avoid these meetings, my lips must utter what I would fain have spared us both. Sir Thomas, this is our last meeting when Katherine Parr must listen to the love words of Sir Thomas Seymour."

"And it is for this you have avoided me these many days, Katherine?" queried the noble, rising to his feet and folding his arms before her.

The lady bowed her head.

"And yet one week yestreen you sat in this very room in my arms, Katherine!" And a smile, half tender, half scornful, broke over that young man's firmly-closed lips.

Katherine spoke not, but buried her face in her hands, mayhap to hide its pallor.

"Katherine Parr—Lady Latimer, it is enough! I have heard it whispered at court, and yet in my faith in your truth and fealty, I would not heed what is now too evident, since your conduct would confirm the tale. Speak, Lady Latimer, and tell me if it be true our royal king hath cast his eyes upon you for his consort. I have a right to demand this, woman!" And the speaker's tones were like iron, falling heavily on the listener's heart.

But no answer came from that wretched woman's lips—though her jewelled hands were clasped more convulsively over the face which she bent suddenly upon the embroidery frame, and one or two hot tears stained the white satin into which those clasping fingers, in the palmy days of love and youth, had wrought rich medallions, the imperial crown of England, and flowers of wondrous beauty and fidelity.

"Yes, it is enough. I am answered! Katherine Parr—scorning Thomas Seymour's humbler love—will sit on England's throne as England's queen. But, Katherine, there have been fair and beautiful women there before thee; and ah! bethink thee, woman, ere it is too late, concerning them. Anne Boleyn, Jane Seymour, and Katherine Howard—what fate was theirs? And hath our King Henry grown more merciful since the last fair neck was bared to the headsman's axe? Bethink thee well, proud, ambitious woman!" said Seymour, hoarsely.

A convulsive shudder shook Katherine Parr's frame. But the hour when these terrible thoughts, now crowding upon her mind, might have availed in turning her aside from her ambitious schemes, was past; now she could only summon her ambition and pride, and advance.

Flinging back her beautiful hair which had fallen forward, sweeping the embroidery frame, and assuming a stern and composed demeanor, she exclaimed, haughtily and firmly:

"This is well! Sir Thomas Seymour's language is that of a traitor to his king! Know you that, did I choose, an hour hence Henry's guard would lead thee to the tower or the scaffold, since such is the fate of those who question a monarch's will?"

"Go on. The loss of life is little worse than the loss of faith in woman's truth. Go on, Katherine!"

These words were uttered in a tone commingling so much of sadness and despair, that the heart of that proud woman was softened; and no longer was her disguise of coldness impenetrable.

"Sir Thomas," she said, after a slight pause, "let us talk calmly together. Spare Katherine Parr your reproaches, and she will spare herself the sternness which is so foreign to her nature. Sir Thomas," and here her voice grew lower and calmer, by an intense effort of will, "what you have heard rumored at court, is true. Our liege, the king, hath besought me to become his consort, and I have not answered nay. Not solely for my own sake have I done this, but for the sake of my land—for, Sir Thomas, Katherine Parr was bred in the Protestant creed, and who can foresee but that this new doctrine of the Reformation may yet, through me, sway the heart of England's king? Judge me not too harshly, Sir Thomas, for you know not how hard the fate of her who yields her own will to the call of duty! Besides, she on whom a monarch rests his eyes, has no other choice than to obey."

"Katherine!"—and the young noble advanced and spoke in somewhat softened tones—"if you had loved me, could you thus resign me? Is it too late, my beloved?" And he knelt at her feet.

"Nay, again thou wouldst take 'vantage of my weakness!' exclaimed the beautiful woman with a frown, under which she buried the keenest suffering. "I have spoken truly and firmly; henceforth, we must meet as strangers, or as the commonest friends, Seymour."

"Nay, say rather as a queen and her subject!" said the young man, passionately. "So wide a gulf does not lie between friends, my lady!" And Seymour stamped his foot.

The interview was becoming painful to the woman whose every power of will was nerved to its utmost tension. O, if he would but go, and leave her alone with her agony!

The noble turned and paced the apartment.

"So, so," he broke forth, "I have been idled, played with—the poor fool of a passing hour—content to steal in here at twilight and play the secret lover, while he, the king, comes openly to talk of a royal marriage! And she, whom I so doted on, but bandied idle lip service and idler caresses on her humbler lover—meantime lifting her eyes to a crown! Talk of duty and religious creeds, forsooth! What true woman ever let prayer-book or psalm come between her and her love? Nay, Katherine—Lady Latimer, it is your ambition hath done this—else, you never loved me! Woman, I pray God you may never meet an hour, when—a fickle king sated, and on the lookout for another victim—when, in the tower's gloomy prisons—you will repent this! But ah! Sir Thomas Seymour forgets, in his own excited mood, that he talks 'treason of his king!'" And he gave utterance to a mocking laugh. "Lady, this head, with whose curls your fair white hands have dallied, waits but your behest to Henry to roll from under the headsman's axe!" And he stopped short before her and bowed.

Katherine could not bear those mocking, horrid words, nor that sarcastic laugh.

"For heaven's sake, Sir Thomas, do not look at me in that way—do not speak thus to me!" And, shuddering, she buried her face in her hands. "Seymour," she added, when a little calmer, "I would sooner die than harm a hair of your head! You could not think I meant that! But go, now—leave me, if you would not kill me! There have been terrible things said here this night." And she peered round into the corners of that antique, panelled room, where the dusky shadows were thickening. "Yes, fearful things," she murmured to herself, swaying to and fro, with face again hidden in the embroidery frame. "Anne Boleyn—Jane Seymour—Katherine Howard—and, alas, if it be that Henry will weary thus of me! Why did I place myself in his power? why promise? why—but ah, it is too late! too late!”

Then, as if remembering who stood before her, and might interpret her emotion aright, she conquered this mood, and raising her head, said sharply:

“Go! Why do you not leave me, Seymour?”

But that man, standing there, had not failed to catch a brief glimpse of Katherine Parr’s heart. It restrained his own excitement; it softened his own despair. His eye lost its angry, sarcastic light—a gleam of pity lit it now. He knelt at Katherine’s feet.

“Katherine, wilt thou forgive all I have uttered in this mad hour? Whatever betides thee—woman or queen—thou shalt have my fealty and my worship. God save thee and help thee, since thou wilt have our ways in life to differ! But O, Katherine, in this hour how much of bitterness and anger would it take from parting, if I knew thou hadst not made me thy tool—if I knew thou hadst loved me!”

And this time Katherine did not shake off the hand that clasped hers, both lying, whitely, on her sable robe; this time she did not angrily and proudly utter words of denial. But bending forward, forward, till her fair hair mingled and floated with his short, close curls—till her forehead rested on his bosom, and then her cheek crept up and laid itself softly against his, while an agonizing rain of tears fell on hair and cheek and shoulder, she said, in broken gasps:

“Thomas—Seymour—I have loved you!”

“And now I go, lest the woman be lost in the queen—lest, next moment, thou snatch from my soul’s sepulchre the torch I will burn evermore beside its buried dead! God bless you, Katherine, you have loved me! I can well afford to let Henry have thee now—thou hast loved me—thou lovest me still, my Katherine!” And with a long, convulsive kiss, the young noble went out into the darkness.

And when, a half hour later, Lady Latimer, calm and pale, rang for lights, and passed into the great receiving-room of her castle, and then, later, supped with Henry of England in her own boudoir—ensnaring, by her beauty, wit, and brilliant colloquial powers, this capricious monarch—who, looking upon her then, would have dreamed in what a drama of love and agony she had enacted during that winter day’s short twilight shadows? Ah, who can read the heart of a woman who casts out love and places ambition a sentry at its gates?

Five times had Henry the Eighth of England led fair and gentle women to the altar, and five times had his unprincipled will and ferocity of temper consigned their partners to a dreadful death—the headsman’s axe. History, perhaps, never recorded royal statutes so tyrannical, so extraordinary, so capricious, as those issued during his reign. The succession to the crown had become an issue of the king’s changing judgment or affection; to-day, the right was jointly that of Mary and Elizabeth, then transferred to the children of Jane Seymour, next restored again to the former. The monarch’s despotic thrall bound England like a slave crouching in his chains.

But, terrible to think of young and lovely women—who had slept upon his heart and become the mother of his children—terrible to think that the tyrant breathed who would deliver them over to prison and death! Side by side with the names of Nero and Caligula, will the memory of Henry the Eighth descend to all future years. Even in his own age there were those found who did not hesitate to express their horror of his cruelty. Christina, Duchess of Milan, refused his hand with a shudder of horror, saying: “If I were possessed of two heads, one of them I would place at the service of Henry of England.”

And yet knowing all this, with the terrible fate of her predecessors before her, in the prime of her womanhood and beauty, Katherine Parr, widow of Lord Latimer, betrothed herself to Henry. What motive power could have thus impelled her? It could not have been love, for twice, already, had she tasted the sweets of conjugal life, and a third time given up her heart to one more consonant with youthful love, if history’s records be true, so widely did the young and handsome Sir Thomas Seymour differ from the two mature widowers who had in turn called fair Katherine Parr wife; it might have been from a desire to promote that faith which gained for her the title of the first Protestant Queen of England—for we read that “from the first moment of her marriage, and long before the king had taken any decided step in favor of the new doctrine of the Reformation, Katherine displayed the interest she really felt for the cause; and, in fact, she was so truly and emphatically Protestant in the full extent and meaning of the phrase, that her accession to the throne may justly be considered as one of the coincidences which ended in the establishment of the Reformation in England.”

Let us hope that her generally ascribed pious sincerity was the impelling principle which led Katherine to deliver herself up as wife of a tyrannical monarch; and yet, beneath all, may there not have slept a tinge of ambition in this woman's heart? Such an impression Sir Thomas Seymour could not banish from his mind, as he left her side that night of parting; and yet he strove to subdue it, murmuring over to himself—"She confessed that she had loved me!"

And so, while Henry supped with the castle's mistress, the rejected lover walked to and fro without—now softened by that confession and nursing hopes that all might yet be as before, then falling into moods of despair and vengeance.

At a late hour, shadows moved athwart the curtains draping the boudoir window, and, a few minutes later, the king made his exit from beneath the castle's arched gateway, while a half-score of his guards lighted their royal master's way to his carriage with flambeaux, whose red gleam flashed far and wide into the darkness.

In the shadows of the wall, near the massive gateway, stood a closely muffled figure; and when Henry's foot was on the carriage step, it moved rapidly nearer.

"I might free her with one stroke, and rid England of a tyrant!" mused the dark figure, while the waving of the torches flashed brightly across a blade of blue steel for a moment. "It is but a stroke—an instant—and then, in this thick night, and in concealment among the many angles and turns of this wall, no one of the king's guard yonder could detect me. But I will not! The love that is won by the dagger stroke, would surely perish so! If the ambitious heart of a woman has led to this, so let it be! She loves me—and yet loves a king, a crown, far better. Ah, my fair Katherine!"—and he raised his eyes to the boudoir window where the white hand of Lady Latimer waved a moment to the king below—"ah, my fair lady, it is a bitter lesson I have learned to-night—and perchance ere thy tears are dried upon my cheeks, he whom thou acknowledged thou didst love, will have begun to learn to hate thee. "What ho! kisses to the king! Ah, sweet Katherine, beware!" And with a mocking bow, he strode away in the darkness.

Many days had not passed, ere there was a royal marriage at Hampton Court. The Bishop of Winchester solemnized the nuptials; the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth were permitted to be present; and, hidden among the deepest shadows behind a massive pillar, enveloped in his ample cloak, from whose muffling folds his dark eyes burned with intense brilliancy, there was another witness—though an uninvited one—of that ceremonial which made her he had so truly loved, England's queen.

Who knows her thoughts in that hour? Perhaps the pealing organ notes seemed a wail—slow and heavy, and terribly like the words of a death sentence; perhaps, in the glitter of chandeliers and the sparkle of jewels, she saw the flash of the headsman's axe; perhaps she saw, nor guest nor priest, but a pale band of terror-stricken women gliding adown the chapel aisles with upraised fingers and reproachful faces—those five fated queens, vanishing away into the shadowy realm of Death!

"It is scarcely possible," says Miss Strickland, "but the cheek of Katherine must have blanched when the nuptial ring was placed on her finger by the ruthless hand that had signed the death-warrant of two of his consorts within the last seven years."

And yet, for aught we know, the same determined spirit that had led her to that hour, sustained her then. Her nature might have been strong and unwavering, her heart valiant and brave, and her soul, perhaps, buoyed with a pious, martyr-like spirit, which led her to regard her marriage as a triumph and augury of the success of her Protestant faith.

But it was over; the vows were spoken. Beside the grim-visaged husband, the fair bride glided down the chapel aisles; and Katherine was queen.

"Well, good bishop—a word with you!" said the Lord Chancellor Wriethesley, meeting Gardiner Bishop of Winchester one morning in the ante-room of the king's chamber. "How fares our liege to-day? I was just seeking audience with his majesty."

"Poorly, poorly!" replied the bishop. "Goes your lordship through the gallery?" And, linking his arm in the chancellor's, he drew him into the corridor; then, glancing about cautiously, as if to make sure they were without listeners, he said, grimly: "I'faith, my lord, but not so bad in body as in mind. This Lutheran creed is fast usurping the good Catholic faith in our liege's heart. The queen is a powerful teacher—and, in his present weak state, Henry is like a puppet in her hands. Our cause is endangered, my lord."

"Ay, no more than I thought," returned the chancellor, bitterly. "Who really rules England? Not Henry, but his queen—and a Protestant queen, too! This comes of woman's subtle reasoning, and Henry's strange infatuation for this one who beguiles the tediousness of his sick room with scholastic and religious disputes. Why, good bishop, they say Queen Katherine argues the knottiest theological points like a prelate, and our king not only permits but is marvellously pleased with her sprightliness and ready wit. I faith, if we allow a woman thus to take church affairs under her sway, these mad Lutheran doctrines will soon undermine the true faith."

"Ha! think you so, my lord?" exclaimed the bishop. "I knew our king liked much these arguings with the queen; but not until to-day, when by chance I came unobserved into the ante room, thus overhearing their debate, not until to-day have I thought seriously what danger threatens our King Henry. And so your lordship thinks the same? Then it is time, indeed, that this be checked, ere the sapling has taken firm root in the soil. What thinkest thou? Will it not be doing the church good service to warn our king against thus lending his ear to heretical doctrines?"

A smile shot across the lord chancellor's lips.

"And does the bishop think our king will so look upon the matter?" he sarcastically exclaimed. "It is no light charge to bring against his majesty's favorite consort. Think you he would believe that heretic doctrines were taught by Katherine's lips?"

"I know our king hath granted Katherine larger liberties and more royal prerogatives than any former wife," replied the bishop. "Witness, that parliamentary act he passed on the eve of leaving England for France by which he conferred upon her the title of queen regent of the realm. And yet there is that"—and he spoke in a lower voice—"there is that in which Katherine is not so near the king's heart as it were possible. Katherine is childless!" And the bishop glanced significantly toward his companion.

"Yes, and other queens have been set aside for lighter faults than this," returned the chancellor, catching at the wicked suggestion. "Gardiner, thou art his majesty's spiritual adviser—thou visitest him in any mood—hast ever seen him vexed or ill-tempered with Katherine?"

"Ay, my lord; but it must be confessed that she hath a marvellous gentle temper, for she never replieth save in soft spoken words. But I do bethink me Henry is sorely afflicted, and values too well the care and nursing of the queen to set her aside for lack of legal issue. Katherine hath become necessary to him—for none can so bathe his head or diseased limbs as she."

"If it were not that she instills this Protestant faith in his mind," said the chancellor, "that must be checked. And how? Bishop," and his tones sank to a whisper, "this was I about to suggest to thee. Thou art allowed free entrance to Henry's room—thou conversest with him daily, and he professes himself a true Catholic!"

"Ay," said the bishop. "Henry hath done nothing openly. And he would deny any deviation from the true faith. Our king is no convert yet to the heretic creed; it is of the danger I do bethink me. Poison seems a honeyed dose when taken from the fair hand of woman, oftentimes, my lord!"

"Then what remains, save to palsy the hand that administers it?" said the chancellor, in a hard, cold, determined tone. "Gardiner, there is no hope for the true church save in Katherine's death-warrant. Ha! you start. But have death-warrants never been signed before?" And a grim smile curved about his lips.

There was a little pause. Bishop Gardiner was not a bad-hearted man; but he was a firm Catholic, and would hesitate at nothing which involved the safety of the papal supremacy. Besides, as the chancellor had truly said, the removal of a queen who swayed her husband's will, and, through him, ruled the realm, seemed the only alternative which might lead to that issue.

"Ay, why not so?" continued the chancellor, still speaking in that low, yet firm, hard voice. "Henry himself deemed it but a trifle to send away to the scaffold her who had displeased him. An idle whim, a causeless jealousy, a mere caprice—and where have they gone, Jane Seymour and Katherine Howard? Who dared to pity or plead for her whom Henry had determined to remove from his path? And why now should Katherine Parr be left to turn our king's brain with her sophistry? Why, like a shorn Samson, shall he linger away his days in this Delilah's lap? My lord bishop, it must not be! Now, while Henry himself is in our borders, must he be won back to the holy mother church. Dost thou not see how easy 'twill be, in some mood when the king is incensed against Katherine, for thee to skilfully direct his mind to theological points and then hint thy belief that the queen is overcoming his faith with this Lutheran heresy? Thou knowest thy path now—eh, good bishop?"

"It is the only alternative, and our cause demands it," replied the bishop. "On the morrow, I will lead Henry's mind to these matters. Your lordship should have been created archbishop, for the church has need of more such vigilant sons." And with a smile, the two passed out together.

And thus the horrid league was formed to entice a feeble woman into weaving her own snare; and no hand was stretched out to turn aside her feet. How well the Catholic bishop succeeded in his fiendish plan, may be inferred from the fact that scarce a day week had passed ere the imbecile and ill-tempered Henry, who, meantime, had been wrought upon by various machinations, had given his consent to the faction who thus misrepresented Katherine's theological disputations for "the drawing of articles accusing his faithful queen of heresy," followed by the mandate for her arrest.

"Ha, this is well! Thus would I deal with all heretics!" exclaimed the Chancellor of Wriothesley, slipping these articles and the paper for Katherine's committal to prison into his pocket, on the morning when he had obtained them. "This is well! The bishop hath nobly performed his part and done good service to our Catholic church. Thus perish all heretics!" And joyfully he hastened on through the long gallery at Whitehall.

It was evening, and Queen Katherine sat alone in her apartment adjoining Henry's. The king, who for months had been suffering under many bodily disorders, had early retired to rest. Katherine's own hand had bathed and rubbed his swollen limbs and helped him to his pillows; for she devoted herself to the duties of a nurse, and by her soothing attentions, had become almost invaluable to the miserable king. Alas! that such attentions and kindness could not save her from the effects of his mean and irritable temper! For the past week, the king had been harder than ever to please; he had often broke forth into violent reproaches, or by the hour together indulged in fits of sullenness or fault-finding.

On this evening, physically wearied and depressed in spirits, the poor queen at length sought her own room, after performing the last offices of the night for Henry. Sitting there, she dismissed her maid, and gave free indulgence to her own sad thoughts. What better than a slave was she—the target whereon struck the venomous arrows of the king's spleen and malice? Her chains, though gilded, fettered her none the less.

"Ah, 'tis a weary, weary life!" she sighed, pressing her hands on her temples. And then came another thought. "Where will it end? Perhaps, even then, her feet were wending in the same path her predecessors had gone! Every day Henry grew more morose, tyrannical, jealous and harder to please!" She uttered a quick agonized cry, and buried her face in her hands.

As she sat thus, a low tap came on her door.

Opening it, she was startled to behold a man closely muffled in a large cloak.

"Hush! not a word," he uttered. And carefully closing the door behind him, then crossing the apartment to assure himself that the door communicating with the king's chamber was shut, he turned and dropped his cloak.

"Sir Thomas Seymour!" cried the queen.

Yes, it was indeed he whom last we saw beneath the castle window of Lady Latimer. Five years had changed the young noble into a sterner, darker, more courtly personage; there was little trace of the queen's lover save that the same eyes looked now upon her as then—eyes in which commingled a mixture of love and despair.

"Yes, it is Seymour, Queen Katherine!" he replied, doffing his hat, as he stood in the presence of royalty. "'Tis years since we met thus, face to face, alone, my queen. You startle—you turn pale. Nay, be not alarmed! Sir Thomas Seymour will not forget in this hour the etiquette to which he submits in the audience room of your majesty. He but come thither to present this petition." And with a respectful bow, he knelt and offered a paper to the queen,

With a slow and trembling hand, Katherine took the folded paper. "It must be of importance, my lord, to urge thee into our very chamber at this unseemly hour. Thou shouldst have waited till the morrow!" she said, with a voice she vainly strove to render firm and imperious.

"Perhaps Queen Katherine will perform unseemly haste, if she but deigns to peruse the papers!" said Seymour, in a strange tone.

The queen opened the paper. Her eye glanced at first lightly along the written sheet, then she grew pale as death. Her lips parted convulsively, she eagerly clutched a second paper which she read like one in a horrible nightmare, then, while they fell from her hand, she sank in an agony of hysterics upon the floor.

In an instant, Sir Thomas Seymour had turned the lock of the door leading to the king's room, lest Henry, awakened by her cries, should seek to enter; then busied himself in the restoration of his queen. Chafing her pallid temples and wrists, bathing her face with perfumed water, and bringing her vinaigrette from the toilette, with the tenderness of a woman he assisted in her recovery. At length she brought a long, deep sigh—a faint tinge came upon her deathly pale cheek—and, transferring her head from his shoulder to the velvet cushions of a couch, Seymour withdrew to a little distance.

The queen sat upright, pushing back her disordered hair, and glared fearfully around.

"Where am I! I thought I read—O, these horrible papers!" and with a white, terror-stricken face, she gazed around till her eyes again fell upon them now lying on the floor.

She shuddered, and covered her eyes with her hands. "It is true, then, and not a terrible dream? O, Henry! and it is thus I, too, am to go at last!" and she burst into a passion of tears.

"Nay, tremble not, my queen!" exclaimed Seymour, now coming forward and taking the papers from the floor, and casting them into a small bronze censer filled with coal burning on the marble hearth. Then, standing beside it, watching the blue flames curl about them till they fell forward—a tiny heap of ashes that a breath might puff away—he turned and knelt before Katherine, who sat with straining eye-balls rivetted on the censer.

"Now thou art saved, my queen! The vengeance of thine enemies will remain unsated—they who have poisoned Henry's mind against thee will hide their heads in confusion. It is the Lord Chancellor and Bishop Gardiner who have done this. Bethink thee, Katherine, hast thou not talked much of late on religious points with the king?" Katherine bowed her head.

"Thus was it, they set a snare for thy feet. They wrought at thy downfall—and the poor king is easily moulded in their hands as the potter's clay. But now thou art saved. On the morrow beware of thy converse with the king; be guarded; defer thine opinion to his, and thou canst regain his lost favor."

The queen sank at his feet and convulsively kissed his hand.

"God bless you, Seymour! You have saved me from the scaffold. But tell me—how—how came you by those dreadful papers?—that dreadful warrant with Henry's own signature?"

"This morning my servant found them in the gallery of Whitehall. They had been dropped by the Lord Chancellor. I am happy that it has been thus in my power to serve the queen."

"And why—why has Seymour done this, when once—once?" but the poor queen broke into a passionate burst of tears. "Ah, Seymour, it might have been your turn now!" she faltered.

"Katherine!"—and the noble's voice grew stern. "Katherine, speak not of that now! I have buried the past. Or, if you will refer to that hour, bethink thee how Thomas Seymour then vowed fealty to her he lost as wife but to serve as queen. Ah, Katherine, I fear me much that the crown sits none too lightly on thy head. But for that, I might have hated ere this her I only pity now. But I must not tarry farther here. Be prudent; be firm; and forget not to render thyself useful as of old to the ailing king. Make thyself necessary to him—and the danger is over. And now, good sleep and rest, fair queen!" and respectfully kissing her hand he resumed his cloak and left the royal apartments.

Next morning Henry endeavored vainly to beguile Katherine into a controversy, as had been his custom of late in accordance with the instructions of the Bishop.

"I cry your mercy, my liege. I am but a feeble woman, and ill able to compete with the head of the church," replied the queen, repressing a shudder and carefully obeying the advice received from Seymour.

"Nay, not so! by St. Mary, you are become a doctor, Kate, to instruct, not to be instructed. Thou forgettest how, many a time, thou hast sought to turn my head with thy Protestant creed!" exclaimed the king in a tone of pique.

"I faith, my liege, thou art wrong in this!" urged Katherine, "for, but that I hoped to amuse thee and turn thy mind from the contemplation of thy grievous bodily affections, I had never argued on these subjects. And, furthermore, why should the king be angry that his wife sought to profit by his superior learning and reasoning powers? Nay, thou judgest me wrongly, my liege!"

"Is it even so, sweetheart?" replied the king, delighted that such deference was paid him, "then we are perfect friends again. Poor soul, thou little knowest how nigh thou hadst become a heretic in Henry's eyes! But henceforth none shall injure thee in our favor. Still art thou Katherine the Queen," and he embraced her with the greatest cordiality.

Next day it was repeated to the queen that the Bishop of Winchester had surely fallen into disgrace with the king, since Henry had expelled him from the Council. And Katherine shuddered and turned pale—remembering what mere accident had saved her and disgraced him.

It was over—Katherine's period of slavery to the imbecile and capricious monarch. Henry the Eighth of England was dead. For the third time Katherine Parr was a widow; and this time a wealthy one—entitled, not only to the dower of a queen, but possessing also an immense private fortune she had amassed by the extravagant indulgence of Henry in his generous moods.

Did her heart thrill with a sense of liberty when the king breathed his last? Did she close his eyes and go out from his presence as one would emerge from a stifling dungeon into the pure, glad, outer air? History on this point is silent—for history deals not with thoughts and emotions, rather with the outward lives and happenings of those who move to and fro upon its pages; and yet, drawing our inferences from the premises therein recorded, we feel that it would not be too much to say that Katherine looked upon Henry's death as a fortunate release from a system of conjugal tyranny. Besides, it is also recorded that, shortly after the king's death, Katherine clandestinely wedded Seymour.

Yes, they were wedded now; and still Katherine was in the prime of mature womanhood—and the noble, high in favor at court, and possessed of every manly grace and beauty.

But yet these five years had brought change to both. Katherine, amid the perils of her position as queen—steering between the Scylla and Charybdis of a feeble king's love and the machinations of his court—could not fail to grow distrustful, and to almost lose her once amiable temper; and Seymour, to whom the intrigues and subtle schemes of a court life had brought experience, and awakened ambitious dreams of preferment and power—ah, he was not the Seymour who, five years before, had sued for Lady Latimer's love!

But Katherine was a dowered queen, and he wedded her—and, further, it must not be supposed that his devotion, of which he had betrayed such late proof in giving into her possession the papers containing the order for her arrest and committal to the tower, had wholly died out. No! when he wedded the widowed queen, this love was strong; yet not many months had passed ere it was rumored at court that Sir Thomas regretted the step of his marriage, since he might have taken a higher one by wedding the young Princess Elizabeth—thus gratifying the ambitious views which were rapidly becoming engrafted into his life.

It was said, too—and there were not wanting titled gossips to carry such a tale to the ears of Lady Seymour, since talebearers belong to the same fraternity the world over—it was said that the young princess, with more of womanly coquetry than womanly modesty, proved herself quite willing to receive attentions and gallantries from her step-mother's handsome husband; and what wonder that, with such a report ranking in her heart, Katherine—half frantic with jealous fears, and remembering a time in the past when her own ambition had stepped between her heart and love—should meet Seymour with reproaches?

But when did reproaches ever soften the heart? On the contrary, they hardened Seymour's; he tauntingly hurled them back upon the sender—evoked the past, with all his love and her cruelty—charged her with wedding Henry of England for his crown and throne—and defiantly asked "Why men might not do what women had done before him?" or, at other times, laughed contemptuously at her jealous remonstrances.

And so it went on; Katherine daily growing more miserable, and the ambitious Sir Thomas casting his eyes longingly on preferments and courtly honors yet above his grasp.

Then it was whispered throughout the palace that Katherine's health was failing—that, sitting alone in her room, she nursed her sorrow, and seemed the embodiment of misery; and then came the sad tale, that Lady Seymour, after the pains and perils of giving birth to a daughter, had died—while a few hesitated not to believe a darker rumor—that the treacherous aid of poison had hastened that tragic death!

Poor Katherine! The grave brought rest!

When Lady Seymour had been dead some days the will of Henry the Eighth was read. One clause in that document attracted the ambitious Sir Thomas Seymour's attention—"Should our well-beloved daughter, the Princess Elizabeth of England, contract a clandestine marriage, henceforth and forever let her and her issue by such a marriage forfeit their right of succession to England's crown."

"By some other means I must obtain her hand!" said the noble, musing as he walked along the palace galleries. "Ah! I have it now! I must gain the consent of the Council. I must warp my brother, protector of the young king, to my designs. Then, Sir Thomas Seymour one day will become the husband of England's future queen!"

But the aspiring man was caught in his own toils. His hasty procedures, coupled with various other imprudent acts, led those high in power at court to issue an order for his arrest; the charge of treason against his brother, Protector Somerset, guardian of the young king, was preferred against him; and, after a brief trial, he was condemned to death on the scaffold.

And thus perished Sir Thomas Seymour, while Katherine had gone before—they two who, scarce five short years before, had breathed love vows but to be sundered then—and, later, spoken them anew till ambition and death had sundered all.

Over two hundred years after the death and burial of the last queen of Henry the Eighth, a gay party of ladies were exploring the ruins of the ancient Sudley Castle, in Gloucestershire—an estate which for many centuries had been retained in possession of the Seymours—and, as recorded in an old MS., the burying place of Katherine. In prosecuting their search among the ruins of the castle chapel, they discovered a block of alabaster in the north wall.

"It looks like a portion of a monument, and perhaps was placed here to mark the resting place of some long deceased member of the ancient Seymour family. See! it is loosely set—the masonry has crumbled away. Let us remove it!" said one in eager mood; and forthwith those merry ladies thoughtlessly slid back the marble slab, and looked within the aperture.

Within about a foot from the surface of the wall they beheld a dark leaden envelope or casing; and one, more courageous than the rest, boldly thrust in her hand and opened this in two places—it yielding readily to her touch.

But how great her terror to observe, face to face with herself, the dead! A face of a corpse!—the shoulders and breast of one long entombed! With a thrill of horror she quickly replaced the leaden envelope, or coffin lid, and turned away sick at heart.

"O, come! let us leave this dreadful place!" she said with a shudder. But another, lingering a moment to read the nearly obliterated inscription on the leaden coffin, repeated—"The letters K. P. are engraved there. Here, then, must lie Katherine Parr, the last queen of Henry Eighth."

They hastened away, forgetting to replace the marble slab; thus the air found free admittance to the coffin which had remained hitherto unsealed for upwards of two centuries—and when others came, attracted by the tale they heard, Katherine Parr's skeleton was still there, but the face and form had crumbled to dust.

PRICE CURRENT.

The price current sheet presents some items of interest. We see "the demand for East India hides is active." Should not this properly come under the head of news from the seat of war?—as the English are just now largely engaged in the business of tanning native hides. "Though the demand for indigo continues good," yet holders look blue. We see "there is a firmer feeling for pig iron." We presume that should read "a firm a-feeling for pig iron." "There is rather more inquiry for sole leather." A strange announcement!—though sole leather is largely applied now-a-days, we were not before aware that any body was anxious to receive it. "There has been a fair demand for assorted sizes of nails." Then the number of henpecked husbands must have largely increased. We read that "tars are firm but quiet." Now we have seen several jolly jacks lately quite unsteady and belligerent. "In beef there is no change." Indeed! we saw a piece lately very much changed. "St. Croix rum remains without change." Of course, unless the change is forthcoming, it remains on the shelves of the retailers. "The business in pulled wool is moderate." A mistake—a good many voters have had wool pulled over their eyes lately. Really, we must get up a price current of our own.

MARY LISTON'S LOVERS.

BY M. A. ATHERTON.

MARY LISTON looked out of her chamber window and sighed. In all her life, she had never felt so utterly weary and miserable before. An hour earlier, the world wore its garb of fresh greenness and beauty, now, there was a shadow upon all things. Afar off she could see the hills purpling up against the sky, and the sunshine lying hotly upon the silent fields and meadowlands. But the summer that was blessing them, to her was a blessing no longer. There was a dry, dismal looking smoke sweeping down from the uplands and far-off clearings, and mixing itself up with the sunlight, so as to mar its beauty; and then it settled off into the sky that skirted the distant hills, and left a soiled border upon its blueness. She bent her sober, brown face against the blind and looked down into her own little garden. The rose-bushes were dry, dusty and worm-eaten; the borders of the diamond-shaped beds were yellow and seared; the hollyhocks and clumps of phlox were like husks as they rattled lazily in the breeze, while the purple faces of her dear pansies were bent closely down to the dry earth. Everything was asking meekly and patiently for rain, yet for many days she had not heeded the mute request. Her watering pot sat indolently by her gardening-hoe in one of the walks, looking as though it had not been used for weeks. A mass of morning-glories had reached up to her window, and hung there a shining wreath of green, dotted with purple, white and pink flowers. How eagerly Mary had watched their climbing all through the long summer, jealously guarding each leaf, bud and blossom, as though it were the costliest of gems; but now she put forth her hand and drew a withered bell in through the blinds roughly, and then sighed long and pityingly, as she tore the purple petals from the stem.

"So," she said to herself, pulling another and another flower from the slender vines—"so, I do not feel it, why should I care? Why should the tears come rushing up to my eyes? I could not help it. It was not my fault that Charles Weldon loved me. What could I do, but just what I did—tell him frankly and honestly that I did not love him, that he was like a brother to me, and that like a brother I always wished him to be? Dear, dear me, what could I do but this!—and yet he went away looking so sad and gloomy! Indeed, I wish I had never been born!" And Mary covered her face with her hands and cried heartily.

For a long time she sat there, busy with her cruel thoughts, which gave birth to a rapid flow of tears—sat there until the afternoon waned away, and the sun sank softly and quietly down behind the hills, and the air grew cool and delicious with the early evening—sat thinking what a great wrong she had done the dear friend who many years had been so kind to her invalid mother and herself. Ever since her father's death, twelve years before, he had been like a son to one, and a brother to the other. To be sure he was wealthy, and the little trifles he had bestowed upon them he would never feel; and to be sure they did not want or care for moneyed favors, since the house they lived in, with a little property beside, had been left them by Mr. Liston—yet he had been such a dear friend—and her mother she was sure was set upon her marrying him. But Mary could not help it, she said, soothingly to herself, raising her head from the window-sill, and smoothing back her tossed hair from her forehead. She could not help it, and she would not break her heart and make herself miserable with mourning.

Just as she said this, she heard some one whistling a lively tune in the street; she listened eagerly for a moment, while the red blood rushed up through the brown of her cheeks. She could hear a step upon the well-beaten sidewalk under the elms, and then—in a moment more, she saw, as she looked shyly through the blinds—for she would not have been seen by any one for the world—a lithe, graceful figure pause, and lean over the garden gate, as if he was waiting for some one he was very sure would come to him. Mary's eyes grew full of light in an instant, and with a pretty flutter of impatience, she smoothed down the folds of her black silk apron, adjusted the large, plump tassels, glanced into her little mirror and re-pinned her muslin collar, then sprang lightly out of the door and down the stairs. But when she gained the hall her step was slackened, and a moment after, as she stood in the door she looked the picture of a pleasant surprise on seeing the young man by the gate.

For one whole hour she stood there, chatting gaily with young Fred Brown, till her collar was damp with dew, and the curls that clustered about his forehead drew up closer and prettier into small, nestling rings. Once, twice, three times did the young man start away from the gate, and then go suddenly back again, as though there was something upon his mind that he could not be burthened with longer; and at last, as Mary stood with one hand on the gate-top, he drew a small box from his pocket, and took therefrom a slender gold ring. Mary bent her eyes in an instant to the ground, as if she were not noticing what he was doing, or mistrusted what he intended to do—although, if the moon had been out, there would have been a rosy blush perceivable upon her whole face.

"Will you wear this, Mary?" asked Fred, taking her hand tenderly in his, and placing the pretty circlet upon her finger. "Will you wear it as I wish you to, as a pledge between us, that sometime we will be all in all, yes, everything to each other?"

Mary did not answer in words, but her hand nestled closely in his, and then, silly girl, as if that were not enough, she bent her head forward, and let it rest for just one little moment against his shoulder, then drew it back again as though frightened at her boldness. There was little more said between them. Their hearts were too full for speech, and Fred, after bidding Mary a low good-night, walked thoughtfully up the street, leaving her alone with her glad, happy thoughts. She did not go into the house for some moments; she must stay out in the free, clear air, till she could compose her feelings, and give this happiness a place in her heart, where it could not flow out into the sight of others; she must look it over once hurriedly, so that the strangeness of its face and possession should not surprise her into a sudden betrayal of its resting-place. For a little time, at least, she must have this joy all to herself—she could not bear that even her mother should know of its existence. She started to take the ring from her finger, as the sound of Charles Weldon's voice came through the window to the spot where she was standing. But, no—Fred had placed it there, and she would never, never, lay it aside until he wished it. There was a fervent enthusiasm in the resolution, and in the strength of it she entered the house and went up to her mother's room.

It was a hard matter for Mary to wear an easy, careless air of indifference, and talk pleasantly and freely, as she had always done in Mr. Weldon's presence before he had asked her to become his wife. But still she went up to her mother's bedside, close by which he was sitting, with a pleasant good evening upon her lips; and she bent down and kissed her tenderly, saying as she did so, that she was sorry she had stayed from her so long. For many days and weeks, she had not seen her mother appear so well and strong. There was a natural light in her soft, blue eyes, a flush upon her cheeks that gave her the appearance of almost perfect health, and even an olden tone to her voice, which she had not recognized for a long time, and had it not been for Mr. Weldon's grief, Mary thought she should have been the happiest creature in existence. But the gentleman appeared as he always did to her, kind, attentive and brotherly, so at last, her embarrassment was entirely away, and before he took his leave she was quite herself again, doubting indeed, whether he had ever cared for her, or had only asked her to be his wife, simply because her mother wished it. She had seen him look at the ring upon her finger without showing feelings of pique or jealousy, and when she went to the door with him, as was her custom, his good night was just as pleasant and kind as it always had been, and the clasp of his hand as true and friendly.

When Mary went back to her mother's room, her resolution to keep all knowledge of her engagement from her mother vanished, she knew not why, and with tears in her eyes she knelt by her bedside, laid her face close by hers upon the pillow and told her all; how she had loved Fred Brown for a long time, because, as she said, she could not help it, and that she hoped sometime to be his wife, when they would all live together and be so very, very happy.

"All?" repeated Mrs. Liston, looking earnestly into her daughter's face, and laying her wasted hand upon her head. "All, Mary?"

"Yes, all, mother. You will be well then; and by that time Fred will have his beautiful new house finished. O such a nice house as it is going to be—he told me all about it this evening. I am very sure we shall be the happiest family in the world, and you, I am sure you will be quite well then."

There was a silence for a few moments, a deep, sad silence, and then Mrs. Liston said, in a soft, pitying voice, that sent the tears with a sudden rush, to Mary's eyes:

"I shall never be well again, my child. I can never gladden your new home with my presence. But do not mar your happiness with gloomy thoughts, dear. Mr. Brown is a good young man; the only fault I can find with him is, that he cares too much for money—he is too ambitious to be rich, just as his father was before him—but if he loves you, and you love him, I have nothing to say. With true love in your hearts you cannot fail to be happy. I want some one to take care of you when I am gone, some one that will be tender of you, just as I have always been, dear—that is all." And she drew her hand caressingly over Mary's wet face. "I once hoped that you would some time marry Charles Weldon," she continued, "but lately I have given that up. For a while I thought as I watched him closely, that he cared for you, but he did not tell me so, and I never sought his confidence. I think now that I was mistaken. O, he's been a noble friend to us, and a friend he has promised to be to you always, after—don't sob so, Mary dear—"

Mrs. Liston did not finish the sentence, but drew Mary's head closer to her, and tried to soothe her by her gentle, quieting touch, and at last Mary fell asleep with her head upon her mother's bosom, and while she slept, Mrs. Liston slept also, a silent, breathless sleep which knows no waking. A sleep upon which the soul glides out as upon a quiet river, into the full glory of eternity's sunlight.

It was a wretched time to Mary Liston; a time of utter loneliness and desolation, but she had friends who stood by her through it all, and who promised over and over again never to forsake her. Friends, I said, who poured promises into her ears, but Charles Weldon was not of these. It was not a friendship that gave itself utterance in words; and while Fred Brown lingered by Mary's side, telling her of his love, and of the future when he should care for her, Charles was doing things that needed to be, and must be done for her comfort, silently and without display. And so the time wore away, Charles Weldon growing nearer and dearer to Mary as it went. Again she gave him her confidence, if possible more freely than before he had frightened her by speaking of his love, just as a meadow brook will flow out more strongly after its waters have been for a moment suddenly checked. At first, after her mother died, Mary thought to go to the home of a widowed aunt and remain awhile, shutting up the house, and dismissing her only servant; but Charles opposed it so decidedly that she gave it up, and at his suggestion invited her aunt to spend the fall and winter with her, so that the old homestead wouldn't be lonely and deserted. He could not bear, he said, to see the snow lie in great heaps by the door, without a well-beaten path running through it; or to see the blinds closed gloomily week after week, and no pleasant light shining out of the parlor windows in the long, dark evenings. O no, he couldn't stand it, and Mary must stay to please him, yes, him—her brother, he added, as Mary's face flushed at his earnestness.

And so it was that the autumn came and went, and the winter stretched out white and chilly upon the earth, and there was no change, after the one great change which had made its sweet mistress so white and still. For awhile, Mary wished that things might always go along in this quiet, even way; wished that Fred and Charles could always visit her, and she, the while, be more a sister and friend to them than anything else. It was strange, yet as often as both gentlemen visited her, they never met, and she knew not why, but she avoided mentioning the name of one to the other.

"It is just as well," she said, when she first thought of speaking of her engagement to Charles. "I am sure it is all the same, so long as he cannot help knowing that Fred's visits mean a great deal; and when the time is set for our marriage, it will be soon enough to talk with him about it."

But the winter wore away, and the subject of marriage was never broached to her by Fred. True, his new house had been completed in the fall, and a number of the neighbors had been invited over to look at it, and it seemed as if they could never weary of praising its beautiful rooms, fine finish, and pleasant location, yet he had never asked Mary to visit it with him. At first, this looked very strange to her, but after a while she forgot to care about it, until people filled her aunt's ears with all sorts of vague rumors. Fred had been heard to remark, the gossips said, and a number of times, too, that he didn't care anything about Mary Liston, and that the fine house he had built would never know her as its mistress.

"Never mind them, auntie," Mary would say, "we know there is no truth in these reports, and why should we care? Why, Fred's visits here throw the lie upon these slanders!"

But still Mary was a bit uneasy, though she knew not why. It seemed as if Fred's manner was changed towards her, and that he did not love her as he once did. She felt, and was almost sure that some sorrow was close upon her, though she could not tell what. But at last, and in good time it was all revealed.

One evening, when Fred visited her, he tarried far beyond his usual hour, as though there was something upon his mind that he could not decide to speak out freely. Several times he drew his gold watch from his pocket, exclaimed at the lateness of the hour, sprang up from his chair, stood a moment before the fire, and then indolently sank back again, muttering something about the extreme cold.

"Shall you teach next summer, Mary?" he asked, carelessly, rising again, and buttoning up his coat.

"Teach? Why, no. Why should I?" was the reply, given in a tone of surprise. And then, in an instant, seeing that she had plainly revealed the direction in which her thoughts ran, she added, "I guess I shall stay with Aunt Lucy, if I conclude to shut up the house."

"Ah. I didn't know what you intended to do. Will Mr. Weldon rent the house? I believe it is his now."

The blood receded from Mary's face at this question. Like lightning flashed over her mind the remembrance of something she had heard when she was a child. That the house that her mother occupied was only theirs so long as her mother lived, then it was to go to an uncle to whom it rightfully belonged. If it was then in Mr. Weldon's possession, he had purchased it so that she should not want a home. Yet she was too wise to allow Fred Brown to see how deeply she was agitated, and she steadied her voice when she answered him, as though all he had said was a familiar story to her:

"I don't know whether he will rent it or not. He has never told me his intentions."

"I should think he would feel the necessity of doing so, since losing so large a portion of his property. He is poor now, comparatively speaking," said Mr. Brown.

Again Mary, with a strong command of voice, and manner that was strange and new to her, answered him:

"Mr. Weldon is not one to be moved by such losses, and the renting or ownership of one house to him is the merest trifle, where to others it would be a matter of as much moment as the saving of their souls."

There was an irony running through Mary's quietly uttered words that was not lost on Fred. He dropped his gaze from her face to the carpet as she spoke, and turned half way about in the direction of the door, as if he were uneasy to go.

"I don't know what I shall busy myself about another year, I am sure," he remarked. "I may sell out my property here, my new house and shop, and go South. I have had a capital offer. Upon the whole, I am quite sure I shall take up with it."

"I should advise you to do so, by all means," answered Mary, smiling.

"I must get rid of the house, at any rate," he continued, persistently, as though there was something about that, that he wished her to understand, and yet had not manliness enough to speak out in an open, direct way.

"I hope you will succeed," was her answer, as she moved along with him towards the door.

There was a silence of a moment, during which Fred nervously drew on his gloves, while Mary took from her finger the ring which he had given her, saying, as she placed it in his hand:

"Such a pledge is useless between us now. It is needed no longer."

"Thank you," said Fred, bowing, and coloring deeply. "I—I suppose before another winter I shall be obliged to address you as Mrs. Weldon."

"The supposition is worthy of your keenness, Mr. Brown, yet I'm afraid you'll have to wait patiently with other people until next winter, before you are made certain upon the point. Good night."

And so they parted and the little dream that had commenced so goldenly in the pleasant summer time, lay broken and dead upon the icy shores of winter.

"God be praised for this!" said Mary Liston, walking slowly up and down the parlor, after Fred Brown had left her. "How plainly I see his loving hand in all the ways he leads me."

Tears half of joy and half of sorrow fell from her eyes. There was bitterness, while there was gratitude in her heart. True, she was homeless now, she could not allow herself to remain in the dear old place longer, but she was saved by the means from union with a man who was but a miserable trickster; a sordid gold hunter, who was capable of sacrificing the purest and best feelings of the human heart to his mean ambition. And Charles? Mary bent her head down to her hands as she thought of him; and her tears and smiles fought a pretty battle upon her face, when she remembered how nobly and disinterestedly he had dealt with her.

"How can I repay him for all this?" she exclaimed. "What a friend he has been to me! How I wish he would come here to-night?"

It was a useless wish, Mary saw at once when she arose and looked out of the window. The streets were dark and deserted. It was very late, and she must content herself until the next day. But the next day did not bring him, or the next, or next, and at last a week past away and he did not come. What could the trouble be? Mary grew pale with anxiety. In his absence, the whole world grew dark to her. For Fred she had not a single thought, regret or wish, but Charles—where, O, where could he be?

"He will come to-night surely," said Mary, one dark, rainy, Saturday evening, drawing a chair up by the window, and seating herself in it, as though she was intent upon bringing him by her resolute, steady watching, if nothing else. "He will come to-night, I feel that he will!"

But her heart sank within her as the hours died away, and the sound of footsteps grew scattering in the street. Still, she did not give him up; and even when ten o'clock was sounded from the little French time-piece upon the mantel-shelf, and she stole out to the hall door and listened eagerly. A faint sound fell upon her ear from the distance. She almost hushed her breath to hearken. She could hear some one coming—yes, Charles, himself was nearing the house, and in her joy she sprang out of the door, and down the wet, slippery walk. But why was it? He did not pause for a moment—did not notice Mary standing by the gate, or turn to see the bright light streaming from the parlor windows, but walked steadily and indifferently by. It might have been forward and unmaidenly, by far too much for Mary Liston to do, but for a moment, she was not mistress of her own actions, and with one quick, impetuous motion, she threw open the gate, exclaiming, as she caught him by the arm:

"Charles, dear Charles, what keeps you away from us so long?"

He could not answer for a minute, she had so surprised him, and then he only said, she thought as if to chide her for her boldness:

"Why, Mary! What brings you out in such a rain?"

But she led him into the house without replying, and motioned him to be seated.

"Now tell me why you have not been here for so long a time—have you been sick?" she began, her dark eyes beaming with eager enthusiasm.

"No, I have not been sick. Do I look pale?"

"Yes. But why did you not come?"

Charles raised his eyes to her face. Her questioning evidently pained him. "I—I could not come, Mary."

"And why, Charles?" she persisted.

"Because," he said, in a low, unsteady voice, "if you will force me to speak it, I was too selfish to look on another's happiness unmoved. Of late I have grown so desolate, that my heart must needs be kept resolutely, as one would keep a bad, passionate child. That is all, Mary."

"But I have wanted you so very much; I have missed you all the time."

"So, you would miss even a trouble, if you were once rid of it," he said playfully.

"Charles!" There was a depth of tenderness in the utterance of that one word that sent the hot blood with a sudden rush of joy through Charles Weldon's heart. He held out his hand.

"Mary, Mary, you would not deceive me—no, you could not be so cruel after—"

"Charles, don't, don't!"

There was no mistaking her this time, and with a joyful cry, he drew her passionately to him.

"All sorrow, past and present, is expiated in this one moment of happiness," he said, pressing his lips to hers. And Mary's answer was like a beautiful echo—"all, all!"

FALSEHOOD.

BY FANNY BELLE.

The dream on the pillow
That flits with the day,
The leaf of the willow
A breath wears away.

The dust on the blossom,
The spray on the sea;
Ay—ask thine own bosom!
Are emblems of thee.

When I trust the dark waters,
And tempests are near,
List the blue sea's false daughters,
And think not on fear,—

O, then I'll believe thee
As once I believed,
Nor dread thou'lt deceive me
As thou hast deceived.

When the rose blooms at Christmas,
I'll trust thee again;
Or the snow falls in summer,—
But never till then!

THE SECRET SLAYER:

—OR,—

THE AVENGER OF AUMALE.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

TOWARDS evening on a summer day, in the year 179—, just as the drum was beating for a change of guard at the street corners and gates of the town of Aumale, a stranger indifferently mounted and somewhat travel-stained, appeared at the principal entrance, and demanded admittance. The sentinel instantly brought his musket to the present, and addressed him somewhat roughly, as follows:

"Stand back, comrade, and answer a few questions. In the first place, give the countersign."

"Countersign?" the other repeated, with a slight accent of surprise.

"Ay, man, that was my word. You've heard of such a name, I'll be bound; for I see about thee a military air, which tells me that at some time thou hast certainly followed the drum."

"Do you know me?" the stranger demanded, with a slight start.

"Know thee, man? By my musket, no," the loquacious guard replied—who, by the way, was a powerfully built man of middle age, bronzed and bearded, and who, in after years became one of Napoleon's veteran grenadiers. "I know no more of thee, than of a dozen other vagabonds who have tried to pass me to-day, and have succeeded no better than thou art likely to. What assurance have I that you are not some royalist spy?"

The stranger bit his lips with an air of vexation, as he rejoined:

"As for that matter, sir guard, I can assure you that your suspicions are wholly without foundation. I am an honest man—a republican, if that will serve to quiet your misgivings—and as great a hater of the aristocrats as yourself. My business here, is with the commander of the garrison—Colonel Duprez, is it not?"

"Right, monsieur," the soldier answered, rather more respectfully.

"You see I am acquainted with him. More than this, I have something to communicate to him which may be of importance. Still, if it you persist in refusing me admittance, I shall be compelled to depart without seeing him."

"By no means, monsieur; you shall go now of a certainty. Be pleased to consider yourself under arrest. Dismount, and don't move from that spot, or the consequences may be unpleasant."

The guard coolly examined the flint and priming of his musket, and continued to pace backward and forward before the gate, narrowly watching his newly-made prisoner. The latter, far from appearing disconcerted at this sudden change of affairs, stood unconcernedly in the position indicated, and evinced not the slightest symptom of fear.

"This is well," he remarked. "I shall now see the colonel."

"Most certainly, if he and you live another twenty minutes."

"And then you will know that I am no spy."

"I hope so, monsieur. However, we shall soon see."

"And in the mean time, soldier of the republic—"

"Plain Andre Descartes," the other interrupted, sturdily.

"Well, then, citizen soldier, Andre Descartes, will you have the goodness to inform me how it happens that I find this good town of Aumale under military law, and in a state of siege?"

"In a moment you shall be gratified. Here comes the relief, and we will now repair to the barracks. Countersign, soldier of the republic?"

"France without aristocrats," was the reply from the relief guard, who had just come up.

"Right, and now, monsieur, be pleased to come with me. Walk by my side, or some of our fellows may pounce upon you for a suspicious personage."

The stranger scrupulously obeyed, remarking:

"Your streets seem to be filled with troops. Why is the town so largely garrisoned?"

"The royalists, pest take them, are very numerous," the soldier replied, scowling. "We must watch them closely, or they would do much mischief. As it is, hardly a day passes without a round dozen of them being seized and stowed in the guard-house. So you see why the town is under strict martial law. The colonel has everything in his hands."

"He is acting under orders of the Directory?" the prisoner queried.

"Certainly; but here we are at the barracks. Follow me—this way, to the left. Here are the colonel's quarters."

Giving the word to the sentinel who stood at the open door, Andre Descartes entered with his prisoner. Two persons were seated in the room, both of whom looked up as the door opened. One was a somewhat stern-looking man, habited in full, military dress. His hair and whiskers were of an iron-gray shade, and his face was seamed and wrinkled, but his bearing was strictly military, and his movements lacked nothing in vigor. The other occupant of the room, who was seated on a camp-stool by his side, was a female, a handsome, coquettishly dressed brunette, who seemed the very personification of a soldier's daughter. Her dark brown eyes rested inquiringly upon the stranger, as he advanced under the charge of Andre, and the glance was quickly returned by one of undisguised admiration, which caused the maiden to turn away her head in confusion. This pantomime was quickly destroyed by the stern voice of Colonel Duprez:

"What now, Andre? Whom have we here?"

"I don't know, commander," Andre replied, with a military salute, "but he insisted upon seeing you, therefore I have brought him along. He has communicated with no one."

"Well, sir," said the officer, turning instantly to the stranger, "who and what are you?"

"I expected to be recognized," the man replied, "but I remember that ten years have made some alteration in my face and figure. My name is Jean Gouvionne."

Colonel Duprez repeated the name with much surprise.

"I have a nephew who is so called, but it is impossible that—"

"Not at all, my dear uncle; I am both Jean Gouvionne and your nephew. Do you not recognize me?"

"This is indeed a surprise," Duprez exclaimed, grasping the other heartily by the hand. "By the mass, Jean, but you have changed; you have inches enough, ay, and whiskers and mustachios for that matter, to make a noble grenadier. If you will join my regiment, you shall have a lieutenant's commission to-morrow. What say you, Jean, will you take it? These are troublous times, and the republic needs stout hearts and willing hands."

"By-and-by, uncle; give me a few days to rest and recruit myself, and I will gladly join the good cause."

The inquisitive eyes of Jean Gouvionne turned again towards the young girl, which Colonel Duprez observing, he immediately called her forward.

"Come hither, Jacqueline, and salute your cousin. This is Monsieur Jean Gouvionne, whom you have often heard me speak of to thee and others. Thou shalt perhaps have him for a husband, my girl, should he become a general of the republic. Madame Jacqueline Gouvionne—of a truth, that has a noble sound. How do you like it, my daughter?"

Blushing and pouting at these half-bantering words, Jacqueline gave her hand to her cousin, and murmured a few inarticulate words of welcome. Nevertheless, she was not for a moment deceived in the character of the man before her. There was a certain boldness in his air and manner which repelled her at first sight, and as she observed his countenance longer, she was still more unfavorably impressed. His eyes were small, gray and restless, and in their quick glances there seemed constantly something of a vindictive nature. The remainder of his features were strangely coarse and sensual, and his whole face was sallow in hue. Still, notwithstanding his unfavorable appearance, his bold, frank manner and speech seemed to have prepossessed Colonel Duprez at first sight, and strongly influenced him in his favor. Many persons, too, see with different eyes, and what appeared rough and repulsive to the critical eye of the fair Jacqueline, might be naturally expected to seem otherwise and more favorable in the military eye and estimation of her father.

"I am happy to meet my fair cousin Jacqueline," Jean Gouvionne remarked, toning down the natural harshness of his voice as much as possible. "Let me hope that we shall be fast friends and loving cousins."

"Nay—Monsieur Jean must wait," Jacqueline replied very decidedly, with a somewhat forbidding expression upon her face. "We must try our acquaintances before we call them friends. And now monsieur will excuse me for the present."

With these words Jacqueline glided quickly from the room. There was an expression of annoyance upon the face of Jean Gouvionne as he followed her with his eyes, during the continuance of which he looked far from amiable. The rigid muscles around the mouth of Colonel Duprez relaxed into an amused smile, and he hastened to say, soothingly:

"You'll like her none the worse for her backwardness by-and-by, Jean. She seems to take no great fancy to you at first sight; but never mind, my boy, she's well worth the winning. Prove yourself a good man and a brave soldier, and you'll soon find favor in her eyes, as well as mine."

This language had the effect of putting Jean Gouvionne into an unusual good humor, and in the course of the conversation which followed, he succeeded in working himself well into the good graces of his uncle. He was evidently gratified at discovering that the latter seemed already to regard him as the future husband of Jacqueline, and he passed by no chance to strengthen the favorable opinion of him which Colonel Duprez had evidently formed.

After Jacqueline had left the presence of her father and would-be lover, she rapidly traversed the passage-way leading to the parade-ground, and soon encountered Andre Descartes. The soldier saluted her with a profound bow, and was passing on when she detained him.

"Stay a moment, Andre," she said, "I must speak with you. You brought this man—my cousin, I believe?"

"Yes, ma'moiselle."

"And what do you think of him?"

"I will speak plainly," Andre replied, after a slight hesitation, "for I can see you don't like him any better than I. Pest on him!" he continued, vehemently, and bringing his musket-stock down emphatically upon the ground. "I don't like him at all; and if the colonel didn't happen to be his uncle, I should say he was a spying aristocrat, in disguise."

"Do you really think so, Andre?" Jacqueline anxiously asked.

"Well, ma'moiselle, perhaps I have said too much, but I don't like the fellow, that's flat. He has such a suspicious way with his little rat-like eyes, and—you'll pardon me, ma'moiselle?—his face is a rascal's face, even if he should happen to be an honest man."

"Why, Andre," Jacqueline replied, laughing merrily, notwithstanding her anxiety, "you give but a bad character to my cousin Jean."

"Can't help it, ma'moiselle; I'm sorry he happens to be your cousin. I shall watch him sharply, for there's something in his face that's not altogether right; and if I never saw those eyes before, then my name's not Andre Descartes; that's flat."

Jacqueline returned no answer, and with another scrupulous salute, the soldier continued on his way. Without exactly knowing why, she confessed herself somewhat alarmed upon finding that Andre's suspicions in regard to Jean Gouvionne tallied so exactly with her own. The face of the latter was one not easily to be forgotten, and the maiden became aware at first sight that she had at some time seen it before—nay, that it must have been an object of dread to her; but when or where it was useless for her to try to remember. After reflecting upon the subject for a time, she slowly sought her apartments, resolved to dismiss the matter as much as possible from her thoughts, to say nothing to her father upon the subject, and meanwhile to avoid the company of Jean Gouvionne, and to quietly but decidedly discourage his advances.

And after all, it must be confessed that Jacqueline's feelings were slightly tinged with disappointment. From her earliest girlhood she had been accustomed to consider her unknown cousin Jean as a type of all that was manly and handsome, and to look forward expectantly to the time when she should meet him to whom her father had been accustomed jestingly to refer as the person who was to be her future husband. There was a deplorable difference between Jean Gouvionne, in propria persona, and the ideal she had so long cherished; still, we must do Jacqueline the justice to say, that she shed very few tears in her privacy, and that those were more through vexation than disappointment.

Upon the following morning, before the drums beat the reveille, there was a strange disturbance in the barracks of Aumale. A low whisper ran through the ranks as the soldiers formed on the parade-ground, and soon Colonel Duprez appeared, surrounded by his officers, and conversing anxiously with Andre Descartes.

The cause of these movements was quickly apparent. Three soldiers advanced slowly from the main entrance to the grounds, bearing a heavy burden, covered by a cloak. It was placed upon the ground, the covering removed, and the soldiers gazed upon the object thus revealed in sorrowful astonishment. It was a dead comrade in arms! The features were horribly contracted and distorted, the limbs stiffened, and the rigid fingers still held the musket with a tenacious grasp. Colonel Duprez hastily examined the body, but no wound was apparent on it.

"Where was this man stationed?" he asked.

"At the outer gate of the barracks, my colonel," Andre replied.

"And you found him thus at his post?"

"I did, just as you see him."

"On my life, then, this is strange! I know not what to make of it."

Further examination revealed a faint, livid line, a small, semi-circular puncture, upon the middle finger of the right hand. The surgeon of the regiment was equally at fault with the others in arriving at any certainty as to the manner of the man's death; no mark could be found other than the one described. The body was speedily buried, but the occurrence was not destined to be forgotten.

Another night elapsed, and the morning brought additional horrors. Two men had been mysteriously stricken down—one at his post, another as he lay upon his iron bedstead. The same livid mark was discovered upon the fingers, but nothing more. The whole garrison had now become alarmed by these mysterious deaths, and notwithstanding all precautions, rumors were transmitted to the citizens of Aumale. Twelve hours had not passed before another victim had fallen! A soldier was discovered in the guard-room, which happened at the time to be otherwise empty, lying upon his face, dead; while upon his finger was found the fatal mark of the secret slayer. The excitement in the garrison was now intense—four victims had fallen by some mysterious hand, and every soldier gazed fearfully upon his neighbor, as if expecting to be the next. Conversation was hushed to a whisper, and duties were performed under constant fear of death.

Upon the evening of the last death, Colonel Duprez was seated in his quarters, reflecting anxiously upon these strange occurrences. Jean Gouvionne was near him, and several officers had just entered the room in obedience to his summons.

"I wish to consult with you, gentlemen," the colonel remarked, "upon these mysterious occurrences which have lately taken place. What opinion shall we form as to the author of these murders?"

Various opinions were instantly advanced. One was sure that a secret agent of the royalists was in the garrison; another, that a terrible and unknown disease had broken out, and still another, that the deaths were mysterious beyond explanation, and entirely unaccountable. Colonel Duprez dissented from all of these.

"You will remember Raymonde Torvil," he remarked.

The officers instantly replied in the affirmative, while Jean Gouvionne suddenly started upon hearing the name. All eyes were at once drawn towards him.

"What is it, Jean?" the colonel asked.

"I—ah—that is—nothing—it was the singularity of the name. Who was he?"

"I was about to tell you. Raymonde Torvil was a soldier in my regiment some four years since. He was a dastardly, villanous churl, and everybody heartily hated him, and wished the regiment well rid of him. He—but what affects you?"

"Nothing; it was a passing tremor. Proceed, I am listening."

"The fellow was twice punished for disorderly conduct, but it worked no change for the better. Imagine my astonishment and indignation shortly after, when I discovered that he had for some time persecuted my daughter, Jacqueline, with his attentions, and declarations of his love, but that she, intimidated by his threats and menaces, had kept the matter secret, and suffered from his annoyance in silence. I instantly summoned Torvil before me, and made known my discovery. He, far from denying the truth, impudently avowed it, and made use of other language which fired my blood with indignation. By my orders the reprobate was immediately taken to the guard-house, and punished with fifty lashes. This punishment he endured unflinchingly, but at its conclusion, after a most bitter oath of vengeance, he fell insensible at my feet. That night he escaped from the guard-house, as well as the town, since which I have not heard a syllable from him. Nevertheless, I have always remembered his words; the savage and vindictive nature of the man prevented me from forgetting him or them, and I have ever since had a foreboding that we would yet hear from him. You know how my fears have been realized."

"But you cannot mean," one of the officers exclaimed, in utter astonishment, "that these murders have been committed by the hand of Raymonde Torvil?"

"I do—I am morally certain of it. Depend upon it, gentlemen, this man is now lurking near us with the means of our swift destruction in his hands. We must be vigilant, or we are lost!"

This reply was received in portentous silence, and shortly after the conference dissolved, each member pondering with terror upon what he had heard.

"I am almost prepared to enter the regiment," Jean Gouvionne remarked, when he found himself alone with his uncle. "My preparations will all be made in a day or two; and meanwhile, I will exert myself to the utmost to discover the secret of these murders."

"Do so—do so, by all means," Colonel Duprez gratefully replied. "By heavens! I would give almost any reward for the capture of this Raymonde Torvil!"

A strange, dark smile curled the lips of Gouvionne as he left the presence of his uncle. He sauntered half an hour upon the parade-ground, waiting for the appearance of Jacqueline; but she came not, and he sought his quarters.

An hour afterwards, a strange, wild cry was heard. The sentry on guard within the barracks rushed promptly in the direction of the sound. Moving in the direction of the officer's quarters, he was barely too late to intercept the retreat of a dark and swift-moving figure; but a short examination revealed the cause of the outcry. Stretched upon the floor of his sleeping-room was one of the officers who had been present at the conference; his eyelids quivered slightly, and he expired as the sentry stood over him, with neither a groan nor the movement of a muscle. His orderly was discovered sitting in the adjoining room, seated in his chair, without one spark of life, and upon the hand of each of these men was also found the mark of the secret slayer!

The conduct of Andre Descartes, since the first advent of the terrible visitation which had so afflicted the garrison of Aumale was strangely cautious and reserved. His voice was rarely heard, and then only when absolutely necessary—he had determined to discover the author of the murders. His suspicions were locked closely in his own breast, but they were strong, and he believed firmly in their truth. To speak plainly, Andre Descartes had an unswerving faith that the paternity of these fearful deeds rested with Jean Gouvionne.

Whenever a favorable opportunity offered itself, the soldier watched him. He dogged him, followed him from place to place, and hung upon his steps with the utmost caution, but all in vain. Not the least confirmation of his suspicions could he obtain. Nevertheless, he persevered unflinching; it had become a fixed pursuit with him, for upon his success, he reflected, might hang the lives of his comrades, as well as his own.

Upon the day succeeding that of the deaths of Captain La Place and his orderly, Andre Descartes mounted guard, as usual, at the outer gate of the town, where we first introduced him. When relieved by the night-guard, he returned to the barracks, but not alone. With him was a bold, handsome, young man of twenty-five, with whom, as on a previous occasion, he immediately sought the presence of Colonel Duprez, but not now, as then, did he immediately retire.

The town clock of Aumale had just ceased striking ten; the sentries for the night had been posted an hour before, with instructions from the captain of the guard to exercise redoubled vigilance. Three persons whom we shall have no difficulty in recognizing as Colonel Duprez, Andre Descartes, and his companion of the afternoon, crept slowly and cautiously around an angle of the parade-ground wall, resting at a motion of the former.

"That will do," he whispered. "Lie close to the shadow of the wall, and watch silently."

A sentinel was passing back and forth near the guard-box, close at hand, humming in a suppressed voice the Marseillaise. The breathing of the watchers grew slow, and their hands instinctively sought each other as if to enjoin silence, as they perceived the figure of a man slowly drawing near. The sentinel discovered him almost at the same instant, and dropping his musket into the hollow of his arm, awaited his approach.

"Who comes?" was the stern hail.

"Citizen Gouvionne," was the immediate reply.

"Advance, Citizen Gouvionne, and give the countersign," the sentinel resumed, relaxing not his vigilance, although he recognized the man by his voice and figure, as well as by his reply.

"The republic and liberty," was the reply to his command.

"Pass on in silence, Citizen Gouvionne."

The latter obeyed, or rather passed on to the extent of a few yards, and then paused. The back of the sentinel was turned towards him, and quick as lightning Jean Gouvionne darted upon him. There was no noise; the bewildered watchers could barely detect the rapid motion of the murderer's right hand towards his victim before the latter fell back silently into his arms. With the same noiseless rapidity, the lifeless soldier was placed upon the ground, his gun placed beside him, and Jean Gouvionne proceeded quietly on his way.

"My God!" groaned the astounded commander, "there can be no doubt now. Let us hasten, and shoot down the fiend, before he practises his devilish art upon more victims."

"Hold! stay a moment," Andre Descartes whispered. "See, he is entering that corner of the barrack-building which he knows is my lodging place. Villain! you have missed your prey for once!"

After the lapse of a short time, Gouvionne appeared again, passing this time near the concealment of those who were watching him. With difficulty Colonel Duprez refrained from drawing his sword, and plunging it into the villain's breast, so great was his excitement.

"See, again!" Andre exclaimed, in a suppressed voice. "He is making for your quarters, my colonel; you can tell what he wishes to do."

To these significant words, the colonel replied through his closed teeth:

"I can—and I know my duty. He has seen his last sunrise!"

Five, ten, fifteen minutes were passed in anxious suspense, but Gouvionne had not yet appeared. Suddenly the young man exclaimed to his companions:

"Heavens! a strange fear has suddenly assailed me. Colonel Duprez, is not Jacqueline's sleeping-room next to yours? And if—"

"Great Heaven! she may be in danger now," the excited father exclaimed. "Let us go—"

"Halt!" interrupted Andre. "He is coming, and not empty-handed, I should judge."

Jean Gouvionne had emerged from the quarters of Colonel Duprez, and was swiftly approaching, bearing something in his arms. As he approached, the excitement of the watchers was by no means diminished by the discovery that his burden was the helpless form of Jacqueline Duprez, whom he had seized from her chamber and gagged, and was now bearing away. This discovery influenced each of the three in the same manner, and they sprang up simultaneously in front of the abductor. The young man waited not an instant; bounding forward, he planted a heavy blow in the face of the abductor, snatching at the same instant the almost insensible Jacqueline from his grasp. Gouvionne staggered and endeavored to regain himself, but a sweeping stroke from the musket of Andre Descartes laid him insensible at his feet. The relief-guard alarmed by the noise of the struggle, came speedily up, and to them was consigned the safe-keeping of the assassin. He was hurried to the guard-house, where he spent the night, heavily ironed and strictly guarded. The body of the slain sentinel was immediately examined, and upon the finger was found the same mysterious semi-circular mark, as was borne by those who had fallen by the same means.

One scene more, and our truthful life-drama has its end.

At sunrise, upon the day following the events just narrated, the regiment of Colonel Duprez was drawn up on the parade-ground to witness the solemn spectacle of a military execution.

The wretched prisoner was led forth, and after a moment's silence, Colonel Duprez commenced speaking:

"You see before you, men and officers," he said, pointing towards Jean Gouvionne, "a wretch whose present condition can excite no sympathy in your breasts. He is the Secret Slayer, whose hand has stricken down seven of our bravest comrades."

Confused exclamations of anger and satisfaction from the ranks followed this announcement.

"The mysterious means by which he wrought so much evil," the colonel pursued, "are unknown to us; he has persisted in refusing to disclose them. Andre, strip off his disguise."

The soldier moved forward at the word, and tore away Jean Gouvionne's false hair and beard. From a dozen throats went up at once the astonished cry:

"Raymonde Torvil!"

"Ay—it is he, and none other! The mystery now lies open to your eyes. Justly punished in yonder guard-house four years since, he swore revenge in the bitterness of his heart, and then made his escape. The disguise and name which he adopted upon his return, a few days since, were well calculated to blind me to his true character, and it would have been a wonder, had we not all been deceived. Under this cloak, as you well know, he has been working out his revenge, and only by an accident were I and another saved from his hand."

"That's true," Andre muttered in an undertone. "The villain couldn't be expected to forget the man who laid the lash so heavily on his back!"

"A providential accident," continued the colonel, "alone prevented him from carrying out his nefarious designs to the full extent. Jean, step forth."

The young man who had been Jacqueline's preserver upon the previous night, now arrayed in the handsome uniform of a lieutenant, advanced to the colonel's side.

"This," said Colonel Duprez, "is Jean Gouvionne, my nephew. His timely arrival yesterday disclosed to me the whole plot, and placed me instantly on the alert. To him is due the praise of rescuing my daughter Jacqueline from the hands of Torvil, and of assisting in the capture of the assassin."

A voice from among the near ranks at this instant shouted:

"Three cheers for Lieutenant Jean Gouvionne and Mademoiselle Jacqueline Duprez!"

Colonel Duprez instantly assumed a stern expression of countenance, but he could not maintain it. Military discipline for the moment gave way to the force of enthusiasm, and the united voices of the whole regiment pealed out three ringing huzzas, which to Raymonde Torvil must have sounded peculiarly unpleasant. Lieutenant Gouvionne repeatedly bowed his acknowledgments, and quiet was at length restored.

"Let the execution now proceed," Colonel Duprez said, in a tone of more than ordinary sternness. "Raymonde Torvil, have you aught to say why your sentence of death should not now be carried into effect? I give you one minute of life."

"It's more than I need," was the gruff reply. "If success had been mine, your troop would have been to-day without a commander, and your daughter safe among the royalists, and without a father. As it is, I have done you harm enough to make me die easy. Have I said enough?"

"You have uttered your dying words, at all events," was the significant answer. "Lieutenant Gouvionne, I leave the execution in your hands. Let it be conducted with all proper haste."

"First company, front rank—forward three paces," was the prompt command of the young officer. The men moved quickly up at the word.

"Ready—present!"

A line of muskets was instantly levelled towards the prisoner.

"Fire!"

A bright blaze and a crashing report answered the command. The smoke rose from the scene of execution, and Raymonde Torvil was discovered lying upon his face.

"He's dead," Andre Descartes exclaimed, "and he'll do no more mischief; but it seems strange that he should fall before the command was fairly given."

"Are you sure that he did?" Lieutenant Gouvionne asked, in surprise.

"Quite sure, my lieutenant—I watched him closely."

Andre's words excited much remark, and the body was ere long examined. To the surprise of all present, the fatal mark was found upon the finger! The volley had swept over his head, and Raymonde Torvil had purposely become his own last victim.

Little more remains to be told. Lieutenant Jean Gouvionne was, after the lapse of several months, made the happy husband of Jacqueline Duprez, who was heard to say, that her husband perfectly filled the idea which she had previously formed of her cousin Jean. And although Jacqueline did not wed a general, she married a man who in after years rose until he attained that rank, the emperor personally conferring it upon him for his bravery at Marengo.

Colonel Duprez met with a soldier's fate, dying in one of the first of the battles which were fought in Italy for the republic.

We have elsewhere intimated that Andre Descartes became one of the "old mustaches" of Napoleon, but his distinguished services merit a more extended notice at our hands. Steadily refusing to leave the ranks, he followed his beloved leader through the campaigns of Italy, Egypt, Austria and Russia, was with him at Dresden, accompanied him to Elba, and was one of the host who rallied around him at Waterloo, in that last struggle for the empire, and fell upon that field of blood, shouting with their last breath, "Vive l'Emperor!"

The mechanism by which Raymonde Torvil accomplished his murderous work was discovered a quarter of a century after his death. The revelation was made by a noted assassin at Paris, at the point of execution, who had left the mysterious mark upon scores of his victims. The instrument of death was simply a ring worn upon the finger. A slight pressure of the thumb upon this, caused to start forth upon the opposite side a diminutive blade, as fine as the point of a needle, upon the end of which was a most powerful and virulent mineral poison, the introduction of which into the blood was almost instant death. Hundreds who read the confession of this criminal readily recalled to mind the events which form the basis of our story, and shuddered as they reflected upon the mysterious and fearful revenge of THE SECRET SLAYER OF AUMALE.

LIFE'S TROUBLES.

We may compare the troubles which we have to undergo in this life, to a great bundle of fagots, far too large for us to lift. But God does not require us to carry the whole at once; he mercifully unties the bundle, and gives first one stick which we are to carry to-day, and another which we are to carry to-morrow, and so on. This we might easily manage, if we would only take the burden appointed for us each day; but we choose to increase our troubles by carrying yesterday's stick over again to-day, and adding to-morrow's burden to our load, before we are required to bear it.—Beecher.

THE RIGHT USE OF THE EYES.—An Italian bishop, who had endured much persecution with a calm, unruffled temper, was asked how he attained such a mastery over himself. "By making a right use of my eyes," said he. "I first look up to heaven, as the place whither I am going to live forever, I next look down upon the earth, and consider how small a space of it will soon be all that I can occupy or want. I then look around me, and think how many are far more wretched than I am."

OLD MEMORIES.

BY M. REBECCA OSBORN.

With the azure sky above me,
And the springing grass beneath,
And the rich and fragrant flowers
Around me like a wreath;
Thus sitting 'neath the shadows
Which the waving elms cast,
I am sadly thinking—
Thinking of the past.
Of a little merry maiden,
Whose bands of shining hair
Fell softly o'er a forehead
Than the Parian stone more fair.

With her laugh so light and joyous,
And her heart so wildly free;
The very soul of merriment,
Unstained and pure was she.
We roamed the green fields, chasing
The painted butterfly;
Or, twining wreaths of wild flowers,
As the sunny hours flew by.
We were side by side when summer
Threw her bright blue sky above,
And the icy wreaths of winter
Bound us firmer in our love.

O, the many airy castles,
By golden pleasures gilt,
In hope's gay, rosy future
Our childhood's fancy built.
Our hearts were light and happy,
As we pictured future years—
All but the recollection
Were effaced by bitter tears.
O, childhood, sunny childhood,
How like a gladome dream!
But thy fondest hopes are broken,
Like the ripples on a stream.

The joyous sight of childhood
Has forever fled my brow,
And I often muse if Jeanne
Is the same bright creature now;
They tell me 'mong the lovely
She bears the palm alone;
But 'tis said the heart soon changes
When it lists the flatterer's tone.
And I would not now behold her,
'Mong that gay and thoughtless train;
For I know that we can never
Be what we were again.

THE FIVE SHILLING NOTE.

BY ARTHUR W. MACKAY.

ONLY one year had passed since Abel Buell and Anna West had become a married pair. The boy-husband was barely twenty, when the year expired; but however strenuous were the Blue Laws of Connecticut in other points, they did not forbid the marriages of mere children—and Abel and his wife were little more so.

But if children in years, they were both mature in intellect, sharp and ingenious, and well calculated to work their way through the world. The town of Killingworth still holds their descendants, and they are among the worthiest and best of the sons and daughters of old Connecticut.

An old, half dilapidated house was the home of the youthful pair; but they were looking forward to the time when they should build a pleasant little cottage, and meantime they made themselves quite happy in their shaky and time-stained room, that creaked wofully even under Anna's light step.

A gentle, pretty creature was the young wife, modest and quiet enough, usually, but with a world of ambition and enterprise in her heart. Gentle as she was, she often spurred Abel to some new thought or purpose, and more than once he would have desponded, in the first year of their marriage, had she not helped him both to plan and to execute. A small farm supplied the wants of their table; a bit of woodland gave them sufficient fuel; and out of Abel's ingenious capabilities all other wants were to find their realization.

In a long-disused chamber at the back of their old tumble-down house, Abel had collected a variety of odd tools, gravers, saws, files, and a thousand other things with which he was constantly at work in his leisure hours—sometimes making little knick-knacks, which Anna would lay away to adorn that pleasant cottage in Cloud land, which was ever before her eyes, and sometimes exercising his really fine mechanical powers upon some invention or other, by which he hoped some day to grow rich and prosperous.

"Come down, Abel! You shall not stay any longer in that old cell to-night!" called out Anna's cheerful voice, as she stood at the bottom of the staircase. "Come and read to me, while I work."

"One moment longer, Anna; I am trying an experiment. Come and stay with me till I get through."

But the little wife scolded and refused—declaring that she would go home to her father, if he did not stay with her more. Abel laughed, as he heard her harmless invectives, and thought how quickly he could press an apology, and seal his pardon, too, upon the pouting lips. It took him longer than he thought; and Anna, who could not bear the loneliness, went up stairs.

"That is right, love; now sit down opposite me, and look at what I have done. If I was inclined to do wrong, love, I could easily make a fortune. But, thank Heaven! I have no disposition."

He held out what had been originally a five shilling note, such as was then used in the colonies, but which he had altered to a five-pound note so ingeniously, that no one could have detected it save by the strictest scrutiny.

"Abel, what are you going to do with this?" she asked, with a half-distrustful look, as he explained the process of alteration.

"Build a palace, and dress you in gold!" said he, laughing. "Ah, Anna, if it were only right to do this! But it is not; and I shall burn this, or perhaps alter it back again. A palace bed would be filled with thorns, if I got it through dishonesty. But Anna, my love, what do you see?"

And well he might ask, for the poor wife's face was blanched to the whiteness of death, and her eyes, fixed on the window opposite her, were distended and wild, as she gazed.

"What is it, dear?" he asked, again.

Anna answered him slowly, and with great effort, speaking through her closed teeth, as if she feared some one would overhear her.

"There is a face—a man's face at the window. Do not look round. Some one, I am sure, who intends an injury, has climbed up to that high window behind you."

"Let us go down, then," said Abel. "We will invite him in, and disarm him if he is an enemy. But, Heaven bless my little goose of a wife! what enemies could she or I have?"

And the light hearted boy, thinking she was deceived, drew her tenderly down stairs, brightened up the smouldering fire, and brought up from the cellar a plate of apples and a pitcher of cider, setting them on the ample hearth to warm. Anna recovered her spirits, allowed that she might have been mistaken, and the rest of the evening passed off very pleasantly.

Early, next morning, Anna was surprised to see two or three men coming up to the house; and still more, on their nearer approach, to recognize the sheriff of Killingworth.

She called hastily to Abel, who was busy with some out-door work, and he came in, wondering, even more than herself, what business brought Mr. Smith to his house. He did not wait long, for as soon as he came into the room, a hand was laid on his shoulder, and he was arrested, in the king's name.

"What have I done?" ejaculated the surprised prisoner. "Surely, I may know for what I am arrested?"

"Certainly, Mr. Buell. You have been accused to the king's attorney, Governor Griswold, of having been detected in counterfeiting money, and you are taken at this time to answer to it."

A mortal paleness seemed to overspread Abel's face. In a moment he thought of the one shilling note, the face at the window, and the hideous punishment that might be his. Poor Anna had mercifully fainted at the first sentence uttered by the sheriff, and she still lay in unconsciousness.

"Do not waken her!" he said to the officer who had stooped to raise her up. "Better that she should die, than wake to see me disgraced!" And the proud boy wept great tears at the ignominy which he felt in his heart of hearts.

He was taken before the king's attorney, Governor Matthew Griswold, tried and found guilty, by witness, of having altered notes to a large amount. The man who saw him, had climbed to the window from curiosity to see what he would be doing in that lonely chamber, every night—his wonder prompting him to bring a ladder, that he might ascertain the truth. He deposed that he had seen the note altered in the hands of Abel, and that when he took it up, it was but a shilling note.

Conscious of his innocence, Abel made a manly and spirited defence of himself, but to no purpose. The stern Puritan judge would not bend an inch—that is, he would not appear to bend. Once off the bench, he was as affable as possible, and really intended to do the best he could for young Buell, having been a friend of his father.

The case, however, was fully proved. The punishment awarded consisted of imprisonment, cropping and branding! All and each of these were to be administered at once. Buell's stout heart quailed at the sentence, for Anna's sake. Would she ever love him again?—a disgraced, mutilated prisoner, branded with his crime upon the forehead? His every thought was a concentrated agony.

He was in the judge's own room, adjoining the court-room, for so the humane man willed it, rather than that the son of his old friend, Stephen Buell, should be seen by the rude crew in the prison. The door suddenly opened, and Anna was in his arms, showering tears and kisses on the pale, stern face. He could not bear this. He felt his own degradation and hers, in being thus marked out for a criminal. Even the knowledge that he intended to harm no one by his unfortunate act, scarcely softened the pang.

He begged her to go home, and not to subject herself to the sneers that would follow her as the wife of a counterfeiter.

"No!" she exclaimed; "here is my place, and all the sneers of the world shall not drive me from you."

"You must not be near me when I suffer the punishment, Anna. Not that I fear it for myself, but you would suffer more than I."

"My poor Abel! what will they do to you?"

"What you must not see. Hark! they are coming now! Leave me!"

The officers approached him, and gently pushed his wife away from his side.

"I will not go!" she cried. "Cruel, savage men! you shall not do this!" as her eye caught the sharp instrument and the hot iron at once.

"Nay, Anna, stay by me if you will, and hold my hand. It will soon be over, and you must be calm, or I shall suffer doubly."

She clung to his hand, and averted her eyes. Not a nerve of the brave boy-husband quivered, as the sharp knife cut through the tip of his ear. The judge had ordered them to lay the severed piece upon his tongue, to keep it warm, and put it instantly back, as soon as the blood ceased to flow rapidly. It was done, and united to the ear by a small plaster.

Now came the branding upon the forehead. "Lightly, and as far up as possible," the judge had said; and this part of the punishment was scarcely felt, the iron being just placed on the skin and held there until the prisoner had uttered the words—"God save the king!"

Abel was wondering at Anna's calmness; but as soon as he could look down upon her, he saw that she had fainted.

"So much for letting women in!" growled the surly old official; but it was observed that he wiped his eyes upon the sleeve of his coat, when he carried her out into the air.

Abel was at first imprisoned in Norwich, but subsequently was carried back to Killingworth. Anna followed him, establishing herself near him, where she could spend most of her time with him; and by the interference of the judge, this was allowed.

She brought instruments to the prison, by which he constructed a lapidary machine, in which he fashioned a large and very beautiful stone. Anna got it set as a ring, by Abel's request, and large enough to fit his own fingers.

"What will you do with it?" she asked, smiling, as the glittering thing lay before them—scarcely a meet ornament for a prisoner.

"You will know by-and-by, dear," was his only answer; and the little wife, grown weaker and tenderer by misfortune, did not press the matter, but sat down to her work as placidly as if the prison had been a palace.

Not so Abel. His proud spirit chafed constantly to be free. Here were his best days, the golden prime of his years, passing away in a prison for an imaginary crime, and the contemptible spy upon his privacy revelling in freedom! It seemed, too, that his friends, if he had any, had forgotten him; for no one came to see him. Even his father's friend, Judge Griswold, who had been very kind, was now in the depths of a political campaign, as he had heard, and could not be supposed to remember him. Abel was growing hard towards the world.

His painful reverie was broken by the entrance of his wife, with a newspaper in her hand. This was always a welcome treat, and never more so than now; for the first words he read were the announcement that Judge Griswold was elected Governor of Connecticut.

"Now, Anna, dear wife, you shall have this ring. I intended it for the governor, but little thought who was to fill that office. I entrust it to you. If the new governor thinks that an innocent man, who can be of use in the world, had better stay here in prison, I will not dispute him; but I do believe that Matthew Griswold, now that he has the power to serve the son of his old friend, will not spurn the petition of my wife. Go and ask him, Anna—and trust me, he will not refuse you."

And she did go; and she won the pardon for Abel by her own eloquence alone—cunningly reserving the ring as a dernier resort, if her woman's tongue should fail. Then she gracefully urged him to wear it in remembrance of two grateful souls, who, on the distant shore to which they should now emigrate, would pray for his prosperity and happiness.

In a foreign land, far from the scene of his mortification, Abel Buell earned a name among the best class of artisans as a lapidary of no small merit. No one knew why he wore the long hair, which hung so inconveniently over his work, and shaded forehead and cheek so deeply; nor did he ever betray that his youth was passed in America. Even when the thunders of the Revolution came booming over the sea, until they were echoed on other shores, he could not resolve to breathe the air which had once oppressed him, so deep and lasting was his sense of the injustice he had sustained.

But when children gathered around them, Anna's heart yearned so lovingly for her native vales, that he could not refuse to go with her and them, to taste once more of New England's hospitality. To his surprise, no one appeared to remember his disgrace; and he began to think that he had thrown away a great deal of unnecessary sensitiveness upon what was so soon forgotten. His midnight spy was no longer in existence.

THE DROP OF WATER.

BY M. B. ANDERSON, M. D.

The drop of water which to-day
Sparkles on the diamond's face,
To-morrow will have fled away,
In roral mists the rose to grace.

To-day it beautifies the pearls
Which stud the ocean's bed—
To-morrow, furiously is hurled,
In fleecy snow-flakes sped.

To-day it glistens on the rose,
Like tears on beauty's cheek—
To-morrow, mid the thunder's roar,
A distant land doth seek.

To-day, resolved to azure cloud,
Again, to-morrow, dew;
To-day, to flowers its freshness 'ford,
To-morrow, death bestrew!

A drop of water—O, how small
The seeming worthless thing—
Yet, drop by drop, combined, withal,
Hence mighty oceans spring.

THE TRIAL.

BY MRS. AGNES L. CRUIKSHANK.

"MOTHER, what makes you look so, are you worse; do you want anything I can get you? Tell me what I can do for you, mother, but don't look at me so." And the speaker, a tall, dark looking young man, bent down until his shaggy locks rested on the pillow, where lay the pale face of a dying woman. Twice the livid lips essayed to utter articulate sounds, and twice the words died away in a faint gurgle; but the third time she said, "Wine!" and her watchful attendant on the instant placed a broken cup to her lips, out of which she feebly drank the reviving cordial.

Again he entreated her to let him assist her, and it was mournful to hear the pleading tones of that strong voice, so full of sorrow and despair.

"Owen, you can do nothing for me, I am dying."

The young man made no reply, only buried his face in his folded arms, and groaned as he leaned on the pillow.

The woman appeared to gain new strength, she raised herself on her elbow and touched him with her thin hand.

"Boy, this is not a horror to me, I have long expected death to come; I do not fear him, but it is dreadful to die before my vengeance is accomplished. Owen, what would you do to make your mother die happy?"

"Anything, mother; speak and tell me what you want, and I will do it if it bring me to the gallows."

The woman shut her eyes and breathed heavily for a few seconds. She was struggling hard with death, but her will was invincible.

"I have much to tell you, Owen. Give me more wine, for that cold hand grasps my heart again. What is the night like? I think I hear the wild wind roaring round the cot."

"It is a dark, stormy night, mother. The rain is falling heavily, and the thunder rolls in the distance." The man shuddered as he spoke, and crossing the miserable room, stirred up the fire into a brilliant blaze. It shone on four smoke-stained walls and a blackened roof, the interior of the meanest kind of hovel. The bed was wretched in the extreme, and all looked black, damp and dirty, out of which the woman's white face looked with startling contrast.

"Dark and stormy!" she muttered. "Dark and stormy, like my life; but it is nearly over now, and then there is no more, no more!"

Again her son came to her side. She laid her thin fingers on his great brown hand.

"Owen, on such a night as this, five-and-twenty years ago, I fled my father's house with Owen Craig, your father. The old man cursed me then. Two years after, when my mother died of a broken heart, he cursed me again, and when he laid himself down to die, his last words were to drive me from his presence. It was horrible, but I would have endured treble the torture for Owen's sake, my idolized husband—the being whom I loved and worshipped alone out of all the world. We were happy then in a pretty cottage he had inherited from his father, and work was plentiful on the neighboring estate. People said Richard Conway was going to marry, and great preparations and improvements were going on. Your father, who had a good friend in the steward, found good employment and excellent wages. I know not what broke up this long-talked of match; some said that the lady, Jane Beresford, refused to keep her plighted troth when she heard how wild and lawless a life her middle-aged lover had led, others that he was the unwilling party, having heard several strange stories whispered about the lady Jane's youthful days. Certain it is that the match was broken off, and a terrible enmity arose between the two families. Richard Conway lived a wilder life than ever, drank deep, and was the terror of the neighborhood when in his crazy fits, and Lady Jane entered a French convent, where she shortly died. Two years after this, the head of the Conway family died, and he became Sir Richard claiming all the estates and every shilling of the property, to the exclusion of his cousin, an orphan girl. But people said he had destroyed the will of his old uncle. Up to this time I had never seen Sir Richard, but he came to our cottage one day, when weary with shooting, and begged a glass of water to quench his thirst. Would that he had died of hunger and thirst ere his fearful footsteps crossed our happy threshold. Would that I had perished ere my hand ministered to his wants. He came again and again, and the last time he dared to tell me his hateful errand. I drove him from my presence and told my husband when he came home, but the mischief was done. A steady system of persecution soon reduced us to poverty, and drove us from our pretty home, and in a miserable cot, little better than this, my twin children were born. You were strong and hearty, but my little girl, my delicate little daughter, was too frail to endure such hardships. We saw her pining daily, while I, faint with hunger, was unable to give the sustenance she needed."

" 'You shall have food,' your father cried. 'I will not see you and your little ones perish before my eyes, while others revel in splendor.'

"He went away but soon returned, bringing in his hand a hare. I knew it had come from Sir Richard's park, but it was no time to indulge in scruples when no food had passed my lips for three days. I ate greedily the broth he prepared for me, and gave some to my infants, and your father watched us with tears running down his face, yet he himself ate nothing. In less than a week he went out again one evening. I knew his errand, but could say nothing to prevent it. That time he did not come back, and all night I strove to quiet the cries of my little, hungry babes, who were again suffering for food.

"At noon next day, Sir Richard himself came and told me all. My husband would come no more. They had caught him in the act of carrying away the stolen hare; a fierce fight had ensued ere he could be taken, and the head gamekeeper had received a severe wound. My husband was in prison, and the hard-hearted tyrant told me, with bitter malice, that 'when he left it he would mount the scaffold.' That evening my little girl died of cold and hunger, but I shed no tear, it was a relief to know that her sufferings were over. I thought of my father's curse when I saw the little limbs quiver and stiffen, and then grow still for ever, but I was stronger now than in my best days.

"Carefully I wrapped you up and fastened you on my back, then took the little cold corpse of my dead babe in my arms, and thus burdened, I left the cottage and set out for my native town, now the place of your father's imprisonment. I never knew how the long journey was performed, only that kind people on the way gave me food for the children, and wondered I would not let them touch the one I held so carefully, but I reached home at last, found friends who listened pitifully to my story, who buried my dead child beside my parents, under the shadow of the old church, and who, when I was ill, tended you and brought me back to consciousness and misery. Your father's trial came on, not for poaching but murder, the man whom he had struck on that fatal night was dead.

"I found friends who would fain have seen justice done, from the physician, who swore that the man had killed himself with liquor, to the lawyer, who exerted every nerve in the vain effort to save an innocent man's life. Vain efforts indeed when opposed to such influence as Richard Conway. Suffice it, boy, that they condemned your father and sent him to a felon's grave. Again I felt the working of the curse, and I left the innocent, happy home of those who had sheltered and succored me, for I would not bring the sorrow and suffering to their door which I felt was my doom. You know only too well how we have struggled through these years, how, without any faults on our own part, we have been driven from society and sent out here to starve on this desolate moor. We owe this all to Richard Conway, whose vengeance has never slept. He is an old man now, has never married, and boundless wealth has fallen to his lot. He lives in luxury, while we, whose comfort he destroyed, perish here for bread or have to steal it to maintain life. I hoped to see the day when retribution should fall on his head, when sorrow should crush his proud heart, and bitter scorn drive him mad as it has me, but now I am dying, and he still lives to rejoice in the desolation he has made."

She paused, faint and out of breath with the exertion of speaking, while with flashing eyes, clenched hands, and hard drawn breath, the son sat muttering threats of vengeance. It was terrible to see the anger in that dark, fierce face, terrible to hear the wicked words which boded ill to the man whose evil deeds had now for the first time reached his ears.

At midnight, when the storm raged fiercest and the thunder rolled heavily overhead, the soul of the miserable mother departed, and Owen Craig, the poacher of the Black Moor, found himself alone in the world. He had loved her alone of all his fellow-creatures, and with her departed the restraint which had hitherto marked his conduct. He had stolen his neighbors' game solely for his and his mother's support; now he would do it for vengeance, to retaliate in every possible way for the unmerited wrongs of his parents. There was much of evil in this man's nature; his love for his mother was the only redeeming trait, and she was not capable of leading him to higher and better aims. Her words had filled his soul with longing for revenge, and he listened eagerly to the suggestions of the evil spirit, who is ever near to assist in leading men to destruction.

At the very hour, when with an aching heart and in savage gloom young Craig was placing the sods on the lonely grave he had made on the Black Moor, a scene of a different description was taking place in a mansion but a few miles distant, and between two people who little dreamed of poverty, loneliness, guilt or sorrow.

In the library of her beautiful home sat the lady Constance Beresford, one of England's fairest daughters, her companion a young man every way her equal, yet an unsuccessful suitor for her hand. The deep blush on cheek and brow showed the lady's agitation, even while she played in seeming indifference with a costly fan, while the gentleman, walking moodily up and down the room, displayed equal if not more annoyance. The sweet voice of the former first broke the silence:

"When you have finished your promenade, I should be glad to ask you a few questions, Clarence; there is something about this I cannot understand."

He came without a word and threw himself on a low cushion at her feet. He was not more than three-and-twenty, slight and elegantly formed, with bright chestnut curls above his white forehead, and blue eyes which looked all the love he felt for the fair girl before him. From infancy he had been the petted darling of two aristocratic families, singularly well provided with unmarried female members; with a princely income and uncontrolled liberty, he was yet too refined and fastidious to fall into the common errors of young men of his class, yet a glance at the two would have satisfied you that Constance Beresford could bestow no love on a man whose highest efforts were made for his own gratification, whose greatest sacrifices were paid at the shrine of fashion.

To be acknowledged the best dressed and most accomplished man of his set, to be admired for his well shaped foot and ladylike hand, to have his taste consulted on matters of dress and equipage, both by male and female friends, to be the oracle, the pattern, the admiration of all his acquaintances, this and this alone was the end and aim of the Hon. Clarence Howard's ambition. And yet the man had much that was good in his composition, qualities which developed by adversity, would have won him respect, but uncalled for in his luxuriant life, were unnoticed and unknown, and suffered to be overrun by the rank weeds of idleness, vanity and adulation. But we have left fair lady Constance too long.

"What motive had you, Clarence, for renewing this conversation which once before I bade you never to resume?"

"Have I not told you the motive which urged me, love to yourself, dear cousin? Think you that is not of itself sufficient to induce a man to face all dangers and perils, even to the braving of your anger?"

The slightest possible frown darkened the lady's brow, as she bent forward a little and looked in his eyes.

"Why will you trifle with me, Clarence? Do you wish that even our friendship shall be ended? Remember I have not much patience to spare; and I know that it was not love alone which suggested to you the idea of renewing your suit."

The smile left the young man's face at her tone and manner.

"I will not trifle, Constance, since it annoys you. Truth to tell, I am in no mood for jesting; yet I had but little hope, and should not have come but for your brother's urgent request. I knew you too well to believe you could change, and this interview, though it has pained me, is scarce a disappointment, in spite of all Alfred said in favor of my hopes."

Lady Constance did not answer for a few moments; she was in deep and painful thought, and her companion went on speaking again:

"We are both young, Constance, and time may give you a more favorable impression of me. May I not indulge some hope that in the future—"

"Not the least, I shall never change, Clarence. I like you well as friend and brother, but you can never be more to me."

"But the reason, the reason. Do for pity's sake give me a reason!" he exclaimed, petulantly. "What have I done to make myself so hateful to you?"

She smiled quietly at his little show of temper. "I despise your whole mode of life, Clarence; your useless days and wasted nights, your devotion to dress and fashion, your dancing, your guitar playing, your little fopperies. I could not marry a man who would perfume his pocket handkerchief, curl his whiskers, or sit at my feet."

Clarence sprang to his feet and went away to the window, while Constance shut the fan in her hand with a violence that shattered the delicate ivory carving. There was again silence for a few minutes, and then she rose and went to him.

"Clarence, it is your own fault. You make me say such things to you, by persevering in a most annoying course. Let us be friends, as we used to be before any such nonsense as this was thought of."

He took the hand she laid on his arm, but when he would have pressed it to his lips it was hastily withdrawn, and she had left the room.

Let us follow her to her own boudoir, where she sat in silence and loneliness, until her maid came to ask permission to absent herself for a few hours, a favor very readily granted; then when the girl had withdrawn, lady Constance lighted a small lamp, undrew the heavy damask drapery which shaded the window of her room, and hung the light in a chain apparently placed there for that purpose. To throw around her person a warm shawl was the next proceeding, and then, precisely as the clock on the great staircase struck ten, she extinguished the light, and with noiseless footsteps left the room, and after passing through long halls and dreary corridors, went out upon the gardens by a side door, only used by the family, and which she locked after her.

Altogether it was a most mysterious proceeding, and only to be accounted for by the meeting which took place in another second, when under the beechwood she met a tall and stately looking cavalier, whose mode of greeting left no doubt as to the terms on which they stood. Few words passed, and those were spoken in love's own tone, too low for other mortals to overhear, but by-and-by the gentleman drew his companion's hand through his arm, and together they walked to a shady arbor which he wished to enter, but finally consented to her wish and sat down on a rustic bench outside.

"The night air is chill, love. I trust you will take no cold." Very carefully he folded the shawl about her, keeping it secure with his arm, but still she spoke not.

"I am not satisfied with these stolen visits, Constance, precious as they are. I feel that I am doing wrong, making you do the same, and acting unworthily altogether. I would call you mine before the whole world, and not steal here like a thief in the night to enjoy an hour in your society. I know not what to do for the right. Sometimes I think it would be best to give up all my hopes; best for you at least."

Very softly she laid her hand upon his lips.

"Richard, you must not say such things, I cannot permit them. You are sad again to-night, and cannot view matters in the best light. It is useless for you to make such resolves, for I will not be given up."

He kissed the little hand and held it fondly in his own.

"Love, it is for your sake I dread these meetings, the peril to your fair fame should it ever be known, and I tremble at the scene you would have to encounter with your father and brother, should it come to their knowledge."

Lady Constance laughed lightly.

"You are more than usually sad, to-night, Richard, but you need not try to infect me with your terrors. My father has never forbidden me to meet you, nor do I feel myself bound to hate you because of the dislike between our families; as for my fair fame, if it is ever called in question, I shall proclaim you my champion and expect you will kill my enemy."

And thus with merry jests she strove to banish the cloud.

"I think I will go and see my uncle, to-morrow, if a reconciliation can be effected. I should not hesitate to come to an explanation with your father; in fact, I would face anything to have the right to meet you here. I cannot endure this suspense any longer."

And thus they talked, the young lovers, until the chimes rang out the midnight hour.

"One moment longer, Constance," Richard pleaded, as she started to her feet, alarmed at the length of their interview. "One moment, dear one, I have a strong presentiment of danger or trouble; it may be that this will be our last meeting."

She laid her hand upon his shoulder, and looked up in his sorrowful, loving eyes.

"In sorrow, in trouble, in life or death, dear Richard, I am yours and yours only. Let us only keep hopeful, do right and trust in God, and we shall yet be happy."

Without another word he pressed her to his heart, kissed her white brow, and they parted.

Lady Constance stood under the shadow of the marble portico, twining rose buds round the neck of her favorite fawn; she wore them in her own bright curls, on her bosom, and fastened in a ribbon at her waist. How she loved the sweet roses and the bright sunshine. Just at this moment the world seemed unusually pleasant. Perhaps it was the remembrance of last night's conversation which lent nature this unusual brilliancy. Suddenly voices fall on her ear, her father and brother, and both appear agitated.

"Bless my heart, what a shocking thing," she hears the elder gentleman say. "And they accuse his nephew of the murder. O, I cannot believe it, bad as I believe all the Conways are."

"But it is actually so, father. They arrested the young man early this morning. He was found lurking in the woods not far from the house."

"And is the old man dead? Richard Conway dead?" And while he spoke there was a touch of remorse at the recollection of his own long cherished dislike.

"He is dead, sir; stabbed through his heart last night, and his nephew, now Sir Richard Conway, is arrested for the murder."

The old man walked slowly up and down the room, something like a tear glittering under his shaggy gray eyebrows.

"We were boys together, and I know he loved Jane, poor Jane. It might have been her fault as much as his that the match was broken. Poor Jane! poor Richard! both dead and gone."

Fortunately, in the depth of his sorrow, the father beheld not that crushed form, clinging to the marble pillars for support; the death-like face, the grief stricken figure of his daughter.

Silently, Lady Constance crept to her chamber, the dark shadow of this dreadful horror going with her, making her heart beat with a dull, heavy pain, and her brain throb with its intense agony. Where was all her joyous light-heartedness of an hour ago? She stood before her mirror, and with a shudder removed the roses, whose bloom made her own pallor more conspicuous. But Lady Constance was not one to sink under grief, let it come in what shape it might. Richard was innocent, she knew that—what had she to fear? She knew not, and yet the terror clung to her heart. If she only knew the particulars, and she dare not inquire.

Once she thought of rushing to her father and telling him all, entreating him to save the man she loved, but the next moment brought a smile at her own folly. No, she would wait. She had advised Richard to have patience, little dreaming how soon she should be called to practise it herself. We dare not linger on the weeks of suffering that passed, the agonies Lady Constance endured in listening to the varied versions of the subject which occupied all minds, and which wore upon her own until her father threatened to call in a physician if she did not soon recover her lost bloom and cheerfulness.

"And so you are really determined to attend the trial, mama?" said Miss Eveline Harcourt, as with a fearfully indolent yawn she arranged the soft pillows of her sofa, and took an easier position. "I am afraid it will be a dreadfully vulgar affair, and I have a horror of such scenes; besides, I don't believe Alfred will go."

"But my love, I know he will, and Constance too, for I asked him yesterday. It will be really quite a fashionable affair, for you see there are many things to be considered. If Richard Conway is acquitted of this, you know, love, there will be Conway Park and twenty thousand a year awaiting some fortunate girl, and it will not do to throw away such a chance. The Howards and the Hardinges and the Stranshams are all going, and you must remember, my dear child, that your two sisters have less fortune than you have, and are not likely to make such a conquest as you have done. Younger sons are not always as fortunate as Lord Alfred, in having large fortunes left them, and unless I do something to help them, my poor girls may both die old maids." And Mrs. Harcourt wiped away a tear which the dismal prospect had called up. And thus it came about, that Richard Conway's trial was truly, as Mrs. Harcourt had foretold, "a fashionable affair."

Conway Park and twenty thousand a year! The owner an "extremely fine-looking young man," as the mother of the four blooming Misses Howard said complacently to herself. "What a catch for one of the girls!" And so looking their loveliest, there they were on the day that Richard Conway was to be tried for his life, and with them a bevy of fair Stranshams, with their cousins the three Miss Hardinges, "the three graces," as they were called among their gentlemen acquaintances. And there, too, sat Lady Constance between her father and brother, the young lover whose attention was divided between the proceedings and his indolent lady-love.

There were few witnesses, the old steward of the murdered man being the principal. He had parted with his master, in the library, at ten o'clock, had seen that the house was secure, and immediately retired to his own apartment. At twelve o'clock he was awakened by a strange noise, had heard a groan, followed by hasty, heavy steps, and the slamming of a door. On hurrying to his master's room he found him on the floor dead, and lying in a pool of blood. Had roused the other servants, but found all efforts to recall life unavailing.

The wife gave precisely the same testimony, and both were positive as to the hour.

The head gamekeeper was examined next. He had met "Master Richard" in the park, at daybreak. "Thought he looked badly, as if he had not slept any all night. Told him what had happened, when he caught hold of a tree to steady himself, and looked dreadful pale."

Then came young Conway's housekeeper and her husband. "He ordered dinner earlier than usual that evening, and rode away immediately afterwards and was gone all night. But that was not uncommon, Mr. Conway had been gone all night several times during the past two months."

There were a few other unimportant witnesses, and then the lawyers had it to themselves.

The case looked very darkly for the prisoner. Evidently his own counsel was laboring under some difficulty, or thought his client guilty, for many remarked the careful avoidance of one particular.

As the prosecuting attorney said with an ill-concealed sneer: "If the prisoner was not at Conway Park at midnight, why not prove where he was at that particular hour of the night in question?" It was proved that he was there at day-dawn, wandering in the park, looking pale and weary. It was rather suspicious that the heir should have been so near at the very hour when the blow of a midnight assassin was putting him in possession of a princely fortune." He alluded to the ill-feeling between the uncle and nephew, and other suspicious circumstances, until "guilty" was written in the expression of each jurymen's face as plainly as if the letters themselves had been there.

Richard had cast but one glance on the assembled ladies and their attendants, and unconscious of the one pale face watching him with trembling anxiety, gave his whole attention to the court.

"Don't you think him extremely handsome, so romantic looking?" asked Eveline Harcourt, of her "most devoted," in a languid whisper.

Lord Alfred scarcely liked the superlatives. He raised his glass and took a cool survey of Richard, then inhaling the delicate perfume of his handkerchief, drawled out: "Passable! I think he is passable, but the idea of murder is so vulgar. To get one's hands and clothes stained with blood, how the thought turns me sick. If they let him off I shall always turn faint when he comes near me."

Miss Harcourt gave an affected little scream, half smothered by her lace handkerchief. "How dreadfully you talk, you'll frighten me to death."

"I am afraid there is no chance for him," whispered Mrs. Harcourt to her next neighbor. "And the next heir is a married man with a family. O, what a pity!"

"My child, you are very pale, and I feel you tremble. You allow this to agitate you too much. We had better retire. The scene has lost its interest for most of our acquaintances."

"But, father, you do not believe he did it."

There was something in Lady Constance's face which made her father draw back.

"I shall be really angry if you allow this to make you so nervous, Constance. Of course he did it, there is not a doubt about it. What is more probable, besides, why not tell where he was that night?"

"Lady Constance Beresford!"

How the name echoed through the great room, sending a thrill of astonishment through the whole assembly, striking Richard Conway like an electric shock, for he well knew what was coming, and paralyzing Lord Alfred so that he only made a feeble grasp at his sister's dress as she rose from her seat and moved forward.

There was a great stir and agitation in court as the lady threw back her veil, and laying her white hand on the book presented to her, took the witness's oath, speaking the words distinctly and slowly, her face meanwhile wearing the cold, calm, haughty expression which had long gained her the name of being the proudest of her proud race. Turning to the judge, before any questions could be asked, Lady Constance thus addressed him:

"My lord, I came here not to answer impertinent questions, but to inform your lordship and the gentlemen of the jury, of a fact which is important in the present state of this case. The prisoner, Richard Conway, was not at Conway Park at twelve o'clock on the night of the murder."

The lady's words were distinctly heard in the dead silence which had fallen, and never perhaps did so short a speech make so great a sensation.

"If not at the scene of the murder, can the lady declare on her oath where he was?"

The solemn voice of the judge restored the silence. The slightest possible tinge of color rose to the lady's cheek, as she replied:

"At the hour mentioned, he was at Beresford House."

The judge mused for an instant. The counsel for the prosecution rose.

"My lord, the prisoner could scarcely have been at Beresford House, without the cognizance of other of its inmates. Some of the servants must be able to swear to this fact, for in so important a case, it is well to have all the evidence possible."

Lady Constance felt the crimson flushing cheek and brow, as she heard the next question. Too well she knew that none but herself knew of Richard's visit. Again the judge asked:

"Who can prove this, Lady Constance?"

She felt that hundreds of eyes were scanning her face, hundreds of whispers would be spread to her shame, if she yielded to the confusion, and lastly the thought that Richard's life depended on her firmness, gave her strength. She was on the point of declaring that their interview had been alone, when from out a gay party of ladies, stepped Clarence Howard, and walking slowly forward, took his place at her side.

Constance sank into the chair placed for her, while the elegant Clarence, after taking a survey of the assemblage, the greater part of whom appeared to inspire him with intense disgust, thus addressed the court:

"Sir Richard Conway was at Beresford House on the night of the murder, at the hour of twelve. The Lady Constance had an interview with him, at which no one was present but myself. Her father and brother were away, and none of the servants were aware of his being there. When the clock struck twelve, the lady warned him of the lateness of the hour; at a quarter past, he took his leave. Sir Richard having chosen to keep this secret, doubtless for fear of bringing the lady's name into court, I did not feel at liberty to speak of it; but Lady Constance having come forth nobly to tell the truth, and save an innocent man, I am happy to be able to add to the strength of her evidence."

Bowing slightly to the court, and profoundly to Lady Constance, he then expressed his willingness to answer any questions, very few of which were asked; and the gentleman fanning himself with a lemon-colored kid glove, daintily stepped across and took his seat in the midst of his party, when he put a vinaigrette to his nose with all the airs of a fine lady.

Lady Constance left the place with her father, but her brother did not return until Richard was pronounced innocent.

As if to confirm the verdict, a note was handed to the judge immediately after, from the keeper of a lunatic asylum, saying that a young man had been placed in his care, and from the nature of his ravings, it was very evident that he had been the murderer of Sir Richard Conway. Richard was at once set at liberty, but was immediately captured and borne off in triumph to "Eveline Lodge," very much to Alfred Beresford's discomfort, who could not help contrasting this stately owner of twenty thousand a year with his own pany self and very moderate fortune.

But as no harm came from the match-making lady's manoeuvres, we must believe that Richard wore a shield upon his heart, which rendered him invulnerable to the charms of fair ladies.

As soon as he could escape from the attentions of his fair hostess, Richard hastened to ascertain who the man was for whose crime he had suffered so much. It proved to be Owen Craig, "the poacher of the Black Moor," and very little inquiry sufficed to give a reason for the dreadful deed. Maddened at the recital of his mother's wrongs, he had taken fearful vengeance on the author of her sufferings, and with one blow ended Sir Richard's wicked life. The excitement of doing such a deed, added to what he previously suffered, had completely unbalanced his mind, and he lived for many years a dangerous maniac.

The exciting scene of the trial proved almost too much for Lady Constance; but after a few days' illness, she began to regain her usual health—a recovery which was greatly hastened by her father one day leading in Richard Conway, to whose visits he now gave an unqualified consent.

The old mansion on the Conway estate was soon after pulled down, and a beautiful home soon stood in the place, to which Richard carried his fair bride one summer morning amid the ringing of bells and the cheers of his devoted tenantry.

"May your pathway be ever as now strewn with flowers," said Clarence Howard, as he bowed over the bride's fair hand, too well-bred to let others see the pang it cost him to lose the only woman he had ever loved; but when a few years of travel had cured him of this romance, he became the most intimate friend at the Conway mansion.

His presence at the stolen meeting in the garden, on that eventful night, was a subject he loved to jest them about, and at last the fair lady learned to speak of it without turning pale.

"I little thought," he would say, "when I was cursing the fate that led me there to be an unwilling listener to your conversation, that it would in the end be the means of doing you both a great service."

And Richard, remembering with a thrill his gentle wife's unpleasant situation on that day, grasps Howard's hand, forgetful of all his fopperies in the recollection of the timely assistance he had been to them both.

PASSING AWAY.

We have short time to stay as you;
 We have as short a spring,
 As quick a growth to meet decay,
 As you or anything:
 We die,
 As your hours do; and dry
 Away,
 Like the summer's rain,
 Or as the pearls of morning's dew,
 Ne'er to be found again.—HARRICK.

Curious Matters.

Photograph of Saturn.

At the Roman Observatory, M. Secchi has obtained a good photograph of Saturn, which shows not only the dark space between the planet and ring, but the shadow of the planet upon the ring. It also establishes two points of considerable interest: First, that the planet is darker than the ring; and, second, that the light of the planet is more powerful than that of our moon. The proof of this is, that it requires twenty seconds to produce a photographic image of the moon, while that of Saturn is produced in eight minutes, or 480 seconds. But Saturn is at least eighty times further from us than the moon; and instead of requiring eighty times the number of seconds to produce his image, he requires only twenty-four times. M. Secchi infers from the planet's superior photographic power that he is surrounded by a reflecting atmosphere, while the moon is destitute of such, and entirely black.

A fat Fish.

The Siskawit, a fish of Lake Superior, is reported to be the fattest fish that swims either in fresh or salt water. The fishermen say that one of these fish, when hung by the tail in the hot sun of a summer's day, will melt and entirely disappear except the bones. In packing about fifty barrels, a few seasons ago, at Isle Royale, one of the fishermen made two and a half barrels of oil from the heads and leaf fat alone, without the least injury to the marketableness of the fish. Besides this leaf fat, the fat or oil is disseminated in a layer of fat and a layer of lean throughout the fish. They are too fat to be eaten fresh, and are put up for the market like the lake white fish and Mackinac trout.

Improved Parasol.

A late Parisian invention consists in making a parasol so that it can be folded in the form of a fan. Instead of folding it in the common manner. A small piece of brass is attached to the end of the shank of the parasol, and on the two sides of this plate two other plates are hinged. To these latter, the ribs of one half of each plate of the parasol are secured by joints which only allow them to move in the same plane of the plate. The two sides of the parasol fold together like a fan, and the shank and handle is jointed, to fold between the two in the same manner.

Astonishing, but true.

A curious calculation has been made by a lover of the astonishing. He finds that 1 pin dropped into the hold of the Leviathan the first week of the year, 2 the second, 4 the third, 8 the fourth, 16 the fifth, and so on, doubling each week, for the whole year (52 weeks), the entire number of pins dropped would be 4,503,599,627,370,495, the weight of them (allowing 200 pins to the ounce) would be 628,292,358 tons, or tonnage enough to fully freight twenty-eight thousand ships of the size of the Leviathan.

Parallel Customs.

In America we expect proof of a young husband's endurance and bravery. We look to see him tolerate for a time his mother-in-law's invasion, and then to behold him defeat and expel her. Curiously enough, Dr. Livingston says that in certain tribes of Africa "no husband is regarded as a worthy member of society, until he has received a severe scourging, and has killed a rhinoceros."

An Ancient Goose.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, writing from Hunterdon County, New Jersey, says: "There is a goose in his neighborhood that has seen the frosts of eighty-three winters, owned by one Mr. Schomp. This goose, famous for its great age, has been kept in the Schomp family ever since the Revolutionary war. When the news came to the people of Reddington Township, Hunterdon County, that the war was ended, and that they were a free people, they collected to have a general drinking jollification. There being some cause for a general rush into the yard where there were four geese, three of them were killed, and the one that escaped, is that which I now speak of. Two years ago she laid four eggs which she hatched. The young family are living and doing well. I was informed by Mr. Schomp, who has owned the goose for the last fifty years, of these facts."

A Delicious Beverage.

A dandified attache at Constantinople travelled into Koordistan, intending to copy Layard and write a book. He was what he called roughing it, with six or seven horses carrying his necessities; i. e., a few things he could not possibly do without. Among them were his wooden frames for cleaning his boots and shoes, and a case of bottles, of a peculiarly fine varnish, for his polished leathers. He was attacked by the Arabs, who overhauled his kit. When they came to the bottles, they opened them; and the varnish being made with Madaba, and scented with all sorts of good things, it smelt so nice that the thieves thought it must be something to drink. In vain did he explain that it was paint for his boots. They were sure it was too delicious for that; and in order to try, he should drink some. So they took out one of his own out-glass tumblers, and made him drink a glass of his own boot varnish!

Curious Pitcher.

Prominent among the curiosities at the Hermitage, once the home of General Jackson, is a wooden pitcher, remarkable both on account of the artistic skill displayed and the celebrity of the tree from which the wood was procured. It was made of wood from the elm tree under which William Penn made the celebrated Indian treaty. The pitcher was presented by the coopers of Philadelphia; and, though it is not larger than a common cream-jug, it contains seven hundred and fifty staves. The hoops, lid and handle are of silver; the bottom is a magnifying glass, by looking through which one is enabled to see the joints, which are invisible to the naked eye.

The Mammoth Cave.

A recent writer says that the avenues in the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, thus far discovered, number two hundred and seventy-five, and their aggregate length is estimated at two hundred miles. Mr. Holsten, who was in the cave when the iron lamp was lost, still resides near its mouth. He is now ninety years of age. Stephen, the old guide, died last year. The temperature of the air of the cave, the same writer remarks, is at fifty-nine degrees Fahrenheit, the air dry and salubrious.

A Strange Fish.

A fish weighing 47 pounds, and measuring five feet in length, was caught a few days since at West Haven. Professor Dana pronounces it to be of the herring species. The scales are as large as a dollar, and have the appearance of pearl.

Remarkable new Invention.

A model of an autographic telegraph, the invention of Signor Bonelli, the director of Sardinian telegraphs, was exhibited at the late exhibition of the manufactures of the Sardinian States at Turin. In a machine on one side of a room, a slip of prepared paper, looking as if silvered, and on which a sentence is written, is inserted, this machine communicates with another at a little distance by an electric wire; a slip of yellow paper inserted between two small rollers, receives in its passage a green stripe, upon which appears the fac-simile of the writing on the paper put into the first machine. It is stated that this is effected by a chemical and electrical combination, and though only at present tried across a room, is nevertheless considered applicable for any distance or for submarine communication.

Crimson Cotton.

Mr. Thomas Smith, who resides in the immediate vicinity of Richmond, Virginia, has a small field of cotton which is considered a curiosity by all who have seen it. It differs but little in appearance from the ordinary kind, except in color, which is as delicately crimson as a maiden's blush. Not only is the stock of this of a gorgeous hue, but the leaves also, the vividness of color fading, however, as it approaches the margin of the leaf, into a purplish green. This is not the effect of disease, or of any extraneous circumstance connected with its culture, but a peculiarity in the plant itself, every stock possessing the same rich and healthful glow, and as thrifty as any cotton in the country.

Strange Duel.

The duelling fever would seem to have become epidemic in Brussels, and several have recently taken place in the regular way; the following, however, is somewhat of a novelty; two young men of Lemberg wished to fight; but, in order to escape the disagreeable consequences which the death of one entails upon the other, they resolved to draw lots as to which of the two should kill himself. He whom fate favored was to quit the city, recalling, in a letter to his adversary, the terms of their agreement; and actually the unhappy young man, obedient to the exigencies of mistaken honor, did not fail to blow out his brains on the day and at the hour fixed.

A Bird Anecdote.

An English paper relates that a pair of crows recently built a nest on a tree near a rookery. This seemed to give offence to the feathered inhabitants of the rookery, who revenged themselves by occasionally stealing materials from their nest. The persecuted birds, however, persevered and completed their nest; but after a council of war in the rookery, a flying brigade attacked the nest and quickly tore it in pieces; notwithstanding a determined resistance by the inmates.

Remarkable Case.

A man named Brown, living near Memphis, Tenn., attempted to commit suicide at La Grange, Mo., a few days since, by shooting himself through the head. The ball passed through the skull between the eyes, and lodged in the back part of the head. Part of the brain was scattered over the front of his hat. Medical aid was quickly at hand, and strange to say, after a period of insensibility, the man revived, and is now able to converse intelligently, and is considered in a fair way of recovery.

Canine Sagacity.

A remarkable instance of canine sagacity has recently occurred in Vermont. A stage-driver between Montpelier and Chelsea left Chelsea (where he resides) for Montpelier, to return to Washington to stop for the night. A child of his being very sick when he left home, he requested his wife to attach a note to the collar of his dog, informing him of the child's state, and to despatch the dog at 10 o'clock in the evening, in search of his master. At about 11 o'clock, Mr. Snow heard the dog at the door of his room in Washington, and upon his collar was the note, informing him that the child was much better. The dog had travelled about ten miles, and with remarkable precision went directly to the room in which his master slept.

Fatality.

An extraordinary instance of fatality has occurred in New Orleans. A German widow in the Third district was married, a short time since, to her fifth husband, not one of the previous four having outlived his wedding a year. A few days since this fifth husband took the yellow fever and died. This singular and most remarkable fatality among the husbands of one lady would create doubtful talk among her acquaintances, were she not well known and respected, and the causes of death of her different husbands well known to their friends.

Wonderful Escape.

As a young gentleman and lady were gazing down from the summit of "Lover's Leap," a high cliff near the White Sulphur Springs, Va., a few days since, the lady, in attempting to pluck a flower from the side of the cliff, lost her balance, and fell with headlong rapidity down the side of the rock. The gentleman hurried round the base of the cliff, expecting to find her mangled remains, but hearing her cry of distress, he looked up, and beheld his lady-love safely suspended by her steel hoops from the projecting limb of a gnarled oak.

Curious Accident.

A son of Hon. Mr. Duval, of Georgetown, Ky., came to his death a few days since from a very singular accident. His father and mother being away from home, a little negro girl got a vial of hartshorn, and was playfully holding it to the noses of the children. In putting it to the nose of the little boy, while he lay upon his back, she spilled the fluid into his mouth and nose. The boy was dead in thirty hours, the child suffering the intense pain.

Remarkable Skill.

Captain Travis, of Louisville, has acquired great reputation as a good shot, but his feat, performed a few days ago, is perhaps the best on record. It is related that he put a cork on top of a bottle, and on the cork a bullet, and then putting the target thirty-four feet from him, welded together the bullet he shot and the one he shot at.

Preserved Silk.

A piece of black web silk, nearly a yard long, in a perfect state of preservation, was recently discovered in North Troy, imbedded in a solid pine log. The wood had apparently grown over the silk, as there was no crack where it could have been thrust in.

A queer Hat.

The latest novelty is a hat made by a hatter in Newark, N. J., which he calls the "cable hat," the rim and band being finished after the manner of the Atlantic cable.

The Florist.

The sun is high,—the birds oppressed with heat
Fly to the shade, until refreshing airs
Lure them again to leave their cool retreat.—
I see about me groves with flowers decked,
Waters and fountains, fields with verdure gay.

SAA DE MIRANDA.

Pretræa Volubilis.

A beautiful climbing plant, with handsome racemes of dark purple flowers, and large, dark green leaves. It is a native of Vera Cruz and Martinique, where it ascends to the summit of lofty trees, hanging from branch to branch in graceful festoons, and producing its flowers in great abundance. This plant is sometimes called the Master Flower, because it flowers about Easter, and is used in the Antilles for decorating the Spanish churches there. It should be grown in chopped turfy loam, mixed with a little peat to keep it open.

Hints concerning Bees.

Bees are most fond of places where their favorite flowers are to be found; therefore bee keepers should encourage the growth of such shrubs and flowers as are known to supply honey and wax in the greatest abundance. The following are some of the flowers and shrubs generally sought for by the little insects, and they add much to the beauty as well as utility of the garden: mignonette, borage, lemon thyme, rosemary and wild thyme. Fields of beans, white clover, and especially buckwheat, are of great benefit, as well as many fruit trees.

Moss Roses.

The moss rose is one of the choicest of flowers, combining the glory of rose, the queenly flower, and the modesty of the violet. In order to perfect them, four things are necessary—a rich deep soil, judicious pruning, freedom from insects, and watering when requisite. If any of these be wrong, the success will be in some way incomplete. Soil is the first consideration; what is called a sound loam they thrive best in. A deep rich, light soil they require, and constant care.

Bulbs.

All hardy bulbs, except those of the Hyacinth and the Tulip, should be kept as dry as possible during the winter, as they are more liable to be injured by wet than cold; and when they are taken up to remove them, sets, etc., it should be in autumn, when the leaves have withered, and they should be planted again as soon as practicable, as they are very apt to be injured by damp if they stay long out of the ground.

Flower-pots.

There are many kinds of flower-pots, but the common red earthen ware are decidedly the best, because they are the most porous, and consequently do not retain the moisture so as to be injurious to the plants they contain. There are some double pots used principally in balconies. When double pots are used, the interstices between the pots should be stuffed with moss kept constantly wet.

Lopexia.

Annual and biennial plants, hardy, half-hardy and tender; but with light pink, feathery flowers, and pretty ball-like fruit, which is produced in long stalks, and is very ornamental. It requires the usual treatment of annuals.

Clipping Hedges.

Almost all thorn hedges are clipped square, that is, the top is made flat and the sides perpendicular, the object of this being to make them as much of a wall as possible. This system, it is thought, has a great tendency to make the hedge grow thin below, and that it is best to keep it widest at the base, and let it gradually taper to a point at the top. Hedges kept square are very apt, when old, to get "blanky," and grow bare near the ground, even though the top may be quite thick and flourishing. In this case there is no remedy but cutting down—a disagreeable necessity, for then all shelter is gone at once; but by keeping the hedge in a pyramidal shape, this will very seldom be necessary.

Carnations in Gardens and Pots.

Carnations are the pride of a garden, and deserve great care and attention. The commonsorts, which are planted in borders, should have a good rich earth about them, and be treated like the pink; but the finer roots should always be potted. Refresh the top of the pot with new soil, and keep the plants free from decayed leaves. Gently stir the earth around each plant occasionally; and, as plants in pots require more water than if planted in the ground, let the carnation be gently moistened every other day during dry weather. The watering should take place in the evening, for flowers are injured by being watered during the heat of the day.

Transplanting deciduous Trees.

In all cases of transplanting deciduous trees, with the exception of the Beech and Hornbeam, some pruning should be given to the top so as to lessen the number of branches and leaves, which are to be supplied by the root. The quantity of branches to be removed will depend partly upon the kind of tree and partly on the intention of the planter, but mainly on the climate and soil. Beech trees, when transplanted, are often injured and die in consequence of having many branches removed. Sycamores and all the acer tribe require little pruning of the head. The same may be said of the Holly, Yew, Lime and Elm.

Wounded Trees.

A simple composition both to make and use, in case of wounded or diseased trees is, one part or one quart of common tar, two parts or two quarts of finely pulverized and sifted chalk. Put the tar in an iron kettle, heat it, and, while hot, stir in the chalk. Care should be taken not to boil it too much, either when first made or when using it, as that will make it too hard and brittle. Should it become so by accident, add tar till it is sufficiently soft. When used, heat it till it boils or becomes exceedingly soft, and cover the wood with a thin coating of it, leaving no place for water to get under the composition. It is very healing, and will remain for years.

Coriaria.

The myrtle-leaved Sumach. A dwarf shrub, with handsome leaves but insignificant flowers. It will grow in any common garden soil, and is increased by division of the roots.

Idiatris.

Weed-looking, hardy perennials, with purplish flowers, which will grow in any common garden soil, and are increased by dividing the roots.

Weeds.

The flower borders should be carefully looked into and every weed extracted, for now is the time when many seeds will ripen and prepare a nice crop for the next season of troublesome weeds. The vacant places made by plants that have flowered, and have had their stalks cut down, may be now generally supplied by greenhouse plants, such as Mesembryanthemums, etc.; or by pots of Thunbergia alata, Schizanthus retusus. Hybrid calceolarias, etc.; which have been prepared purposely for filling up blanks. A number of German Stocks and Asters may now be planted out. The evergreens in the shrubberies may be pruned so as to prevent them from touching each other; and those flower seeds which are ripe be gathered.

Sand.

Sand is an important article in the propagation and culture of plants, and no good garden, whether large or small, ought to be without a stock of it. Sand relatively to gardening is of two kinds: pure white silver sand, free from earthy matter and ferruginous particles, which is only found in particular situations; and common brown or gray sand, which is found in pits either with or without gravel, and on the shores of rivers and the sea. The first kind of sand is used for striking heaths and other plants difficult to root by cuttings, and also for mixing with peat for growing the more tender kinds of house plants.

Anthemis.

The Chamomile. The Pellitory of Spain, is a pretty little perennial, with large white flowers, stained with lilac on the back. It is a suitable plant for rockwork, or boxes in a balcony, as it requires a warm, dry situation. Miller raised this plant in rather a curious way in 1782, finding some seeds among some Malaga raisins, to which they had adhered. The root was formerly considered good for the toothache. The Arabian Chamomile, a pretty low-growing annual, with yellow flowers, is now called Cladanthus Arabicus.

Pancreatum.

The Sea Daffodil. Splendid lily-like bulbous rooted plants, some of which require a stove, and others the greenhouse. They should be grown in light loam and vegetable mould, and should be allowed a season of rest, by being kept without water when not in a growing state.

Deptford Pink.

An annual species of Dianthus, with clusters of small pink scentless flowers, something like those of Lobel's Catchfly. A native of Britain, generally found in gravelly soils, and growing freely in any garden where the soil is not too rich.

Achimenes.

A new name applied to the genus Trevizana, some new species of which have lately been introduced here from Guatemala. Easy of culture, requiring only rather a protected situation; soil a sandy loam.

Ricotia.

A very pretty little annual, nearly allied to Lunaria, which only requires sowing in an open border in April, or planting in a pot in the house, where it will keep in flower all winter.

Securidace.

Stove climbers from the West Indies, with white flowers, which should be grown in a mixture of peat and loam.

Evergreens.

No garden should be without a due proportion of evergreens, and these plants are more essential in a small garden than in a large one. Their advantages are, that they afford a screen to secure privacy in winter as well as in summer; that they preserve an appearance of verdure in all seasons; and that they do not disfigure the walks by falling leaves. They also afford a rich background to those shrubs and trees which produce their flowers before their leaves; such as the double blossomed Peach, the Almond, Snowy Mespilus, and Magnolia Conspicua. It is the want of evergreens which gives to the gardens in the neighborhood of Paris and most other continental cities such an air of meagreness and poverty. But there it cannot be remedied, as few evergreens will resist the cold of their winters.

Training.

A new mode of training fruit trees, practised in the north of Russia, is well deserving of trial in the colder parts of New England, especially for cultivating the peach. A tree, one year from the graft, is headed down to two healthy strong wood buds. These are trained horizontally, about ten or twelve inches from the ground, to a south wall—perhaps the north side of a wall would do as well in our changeable climate. These arms are suffered to throw vertical shoots, which become covered with fruit spurs. These vertical shoots are kept shortened in to a length of not more than about one or two feet. The whole tree may thus easily be covered in the winter with straw, matting or earth.

From the Seed.

Young ladies are apt to lack the patience to cultivate flowers from the seed, preferring to obtain cuttings; but the most beautiful varieties and choice plants are obtained from the seed. It is very rare to see the same flower produced twice from the seed, therefore if any especial variety is preferred, and exactly the same sought for, biennials and perennials should be propagated by layers and cuttings.

Shade Trees.

The maple is one of the best trees to have before your door for the purpose of shade. It is not affected one particle by the extremes of heat and cold—the leaves never curl up, or lose their freshness, and in the fall the leaves change to the most gorgeous tints. The bark is clean and smooth, free from all insects, and the tree is a rapid, vigorous grower.

Geraniums.

All the shrubby kinds of these plants are kept in the house as a general thing, but that is necessary during the cold weather. In the summer the plants will thrive finely in the open garden, requiring only a little more attention than most garden plants.

Leucopogon.

Australian half-hardy shrubs, with spikes of feathery white flowers. They are very abundant in the temperate regions of Australia, and require only a slight protection in New England during the winter.

Gilly-flower.

An elegant, showy, fragrant plant, of two kinds—biennial and annual. The annuals are commonly called Ten Weeks' Stock. Of these there are several varieties, red, white, purple and scarlet. Every garden should have them.

The Housewife.

Fine Rhubarb Jam.

Let the rhubarb be drawn on a dry day; wipe the stalks clean, but do not wash them; peel off the skin and coarse fibres, and slice the stalks thin. To each pound thus prepared, allow a pound of fine sugar in fine powder; put the fruit in a pan, and strew a quarter of the sugar amongst it and over it; let it stand until the sugar is dissolved, when boil it slowly to a smooth pulp; take it from the fire, and stir in the remainder of the sugar by degrees; when it is dissolved, boil the preserve quickly until it becomes very thick, and leaves the bottom of the pan visible when stirred. The time required for preparing this preserve will depend on the kind of rhubarb used, and the time of year in which it is made. It will vary from an hour and a half to two hours and a quarter. The juice should be slowly drawn from it at first.

To preserve Purple Plums.

Make a syrup of clean brown sugar; clarify it, and when perfectly clear and boiling hot, pour it over the plums, having picked out all unsound ones and stems; let them remain in the syrup two days, then drain it off, make it boiling hot, skim it, and pour it over again; let them remain another day or two, then put them in a preserving-kettle over the fire, and simmer gently until the syrup is reduced, and thick or rich. One pound of sugar for each pound of plums. Small damsons are very fine preserved as cherries or any other ripe fruit. Clarify the syrup, and when boiling hot put in the plums; let them boil very gently until they are cooked, and the syrup rich. Put them in pot or jars.

Tomato Catsup.

Take ripe tomatoes and scald them just sufficient to allow you to take off the skin; then let them stand for a day, covered with salt; strain them thoroughly, to remove the seeds. Then to every two quarts, three ounces of cloves, two of black pepper, two nutmegs, and a very little cayenne pepper, with a little salt. Boil the liquor for half an hour, and then let it cool and settle. Add a pint of the best cider vinegar, after which bottle it, corking and sealing it tightly. Keep it always in a cool place.

Baked Sweet Apples.

Wash well the apples; place them in a pan with a very little water, that the juice may not burn, if they are to be cooked in a brick oven; then put the apples in a jar, cover them close, and bake them five or six hours. Sweet apples should be baked long after they are tender.

Arrow-Root Jelly.

Steep for some hours, in two table-spoonfuls of water, the peel of a lemon, and three or four bitter almonds pounded; strain, and mix it with three table-spoonfuls of arrow-root, the same quantity of lemon-juice, and one of brandy; sweeten, and stir it over the fire till quite thick, and when quite cold, put it into jelly glasses.

Cold fried Chicken.

Cut the chicken in quarters, and take off the skin, rub it with an egg beaten up, and cover it with grated bread seasoned with pepper, salt, grated lemon-peel, and chopped parsley, fry it in butter, thicken a little brown gravy with flour and butter, add a little cayenne pepper, lemon pickle, and mushroom catsup.

To make good Coffee.

Put two ounces of freshly-ground coffee into a small saucepan, over a gentle fire, stirring occasionally until the coffee is thoroughly heated. Then pour over it a pint of boiling water, covering closely that the aroma may not escape. Let it stand near the fire from four to six minutes; now strain the coffee very gently through a piece of thick gauze. Warm it again over the fire, add hot milk and sugar (crystallized is the best), and serve it at table.

Jam of Green Gages.

Put ripe green gages into a kettle with very little water, and let them stew until soft; then rub them through a sieve or colander, and to every pint of pulp put a pound of white sugar powdered fine; then put it in a preserving kettle over the fire, stir it until the whole is of the consistence of jelly, then take it off; put the marmalade in small jars or tumblers, and cover as directed for jelly. Any sort of plums may be done in this manner.

To stew Pears.

Pare them and cut them in halves, if large, or leave them whole, if small; put them in a stew-pan with a very little water, cover them and let them stew till tender, then add a small teacup of sugar to a quarter of a peck of pears. Let them stew until the syrup is rich; a lemon boiled with the pears, and sliced thin when the sugar is put in, improves both flavor and color; or a wineglass of red wine may be used instead.

Pea Fowls.

These magnificent birds make a noble roast, and when young are very excellent; they are larded, plain roasted, and served with the tail stuck into the bird, which you have preserved, the head with its feathers being left folded up in paper, and tucked under the wing; roast about an hour and a half, take the paper from the head and neck, dress it upon your dish with water-cresses, and the gravy and bread-sauce separate in a boat.

To keep Damsons.

Put them in small stone jars, or wide-mouth glass bottles, and set the mup to their necks in a kettle of cold water; set it over the fire to become boiling hot, then take it off, and let the bottles remain until the water is cold; the next day fill the bottles with cold water, and cork and seal them. These may be used the same as fresh fruit. Green gages may be done in this way.

To dry Plums.

Split ripe plums, take the stones from them, and lay them on plates or sieves to dry in a warm oven or hot sun; take them in at sunset, and do not put them out again until the sun will be upon them; turn them that they may be done evenly; when perfectly dry, pack them in jars or boxes lined with paper, or keep them in bags; hang them in an airy place.

To bake Pears.

Wash half a peck of tart pears, cut the stems so as to leave only an inch length; put them in an iron pot over the fire, with half a pint of water and a pint of molasses to them; cover the pot or kettle, and let them boil rather gently until the pears are soft and the syrup rich, almost like candy; take care not to scorch it.

To boil Rice.

Wash well in two separate waters a pound of the best Carolina rice, then have two quarts of water boiling in a stewpan, into which throw your rice, boil it until three parts done, then drain it on a sieve; butter the interior of a stewpan, in which put your rice, place the lid on tight, and put it into a warm oven upon a trivet until the rice is perfectly tender, or by the side of the fire; serve it separate with curry, or any other dish where required. Prepared thus, every grain will be separate and quite white.

Stewed Pigeons.

Clean and cut them in quarters. Wash and season with pepper and salt; put them in a stewpan, with as much water as will nearly cover them. Put in a piece of butter mixed with a little flour. Let them stew until they become quite tender. If the gravy should be too thin, add a piece of butter rubbed in flour, and let them stew a few minutes longer. When done, if not sufficiently seasoned, more may be added. Then send to table hot, in a covered dish.

Succotash.

Take one dozen ears of green corn, cut the grains from the cob, wash one quart of lima beans and mix with the corn. Put the whole on to boil in two quarts of water with one pound and a half of nice pickled pork. If the pork should not make the vegetables salt enough, add a little more, with black pepper to the taste. When the water has boiled away to one half of the original quantity, serve the whole in a tureen as soup.

Beef Steaks.

Take two or more sirloin steaks; pound and wash them. Place the gridiron over the fire, and when hot, put on the steaks and cover them close. They require to be done quickly. In turning, do not stick a fork in them, as that will cause the juice to escape. When done, place them on a heated dish—season with salt and pepper, and baste well with fresh butter; then send to table hot.

Doughnuts.

One and a half pints of rich milk, half a pint of melted butter and lard, half a teaspoonful of sugar, some salt, half of a small sized tablespoonful of ground cinnamon, and four eggs—well beaten. Let your dough rise in your crock, and then make it up into a loaf not very stiff. Afterward work it up again, cut out your cakes, and let them rise before you bake them.

Boiled Crabs.

Boil them in salt and water twenty minutes, take them out, break off the claws, wipe the crabs very clean, throw away the small claws, but the large ones may be cracked and sent to table. Rub a little sweet oil on the shells, to make them a fine color.

Fried Calf's Liver.

Cut the liver in thin slices, wash it, put it in salt and water, and let it stand for half an hour, to draw out all the blood. Then wash it, and season with pepper and a little more salt. Fry it in lard; serve hot and nicely browned.

Lamb Pie.

Cut a small neck of lamb into chops, which must not be too fat, season them lightly with pepper and salt, and lay them in your pie-dish, with a few new potatoes in slices, pour in a little water, then cover and bake.

Nectar.

Chop half a pound of raisins in the sun, one pound of powdered loaf sugar, two lemons sliced, and the peel of one. Put them into an earthen vessel with two gallons of water, the water having been boiled half an hour, and put them in while the water is boiling. Let it stand three or four days, stirring it twice a day; then strain it, and in a fortnight it will be ready for use.

Sauce for Plum Pudding.

A good sauce for plum pudding may be made by melting some fresh butter in the way butter is usually melted for sauce. Then add to it some brandy, either a wine-glassful or half one (according to the quantity of sauce required), sweeten it to the taste with moist sugar. Give the whole two or three whisks over the fire, and serve it in a sauce tureen.

Baroness's Pudding.

Three-quarters of a pound of suet, three-quarters of a pound of flour, three-quarters of a pound of raisins (weighed after stoning), and a pinch of salt. Mix well with new milk, and boil in a cloth four hours and a half. We can confidently recommend this pudding, and would advise our subscribers to try it as soon as they possibly can.

To remove Mildew.

Take two ounces of chloride of lime, pour on it a quart of boiling water, then add three quarts of cold water; steep the linen twelve hours, when every spot will be extracted. This will be found to quite surpass the butter-milk and chalk receipt so often used.

How to clean Leather Gaiters.

The following will give them a good polish. The whites of three eggs evaporated till the substance left resembles the common gum, dissolved in a pint of gin, and put into an ordinary wine bottle, and fill up with water.

Carrot Jam.

Boil some carrots quite tender, rub them through a colander, then through a sieve; to one pound of pulp put one pound of white sugar; boil it to a jam; when nearly cold add the juice of two lemons, and the rind grated fine.

Carrot Marmalade.

Boil one pound of carrots, and scrape off the outside; make syrup as for other sweetmeats, only adding one ounce of ginger to one pound of sugar: boil it well, and strain till the carrots are quite clear.

To remove Sunburn.

Rectified spirits of wine, one ounce; water, eight ounces; half an ounce of orange-flower water, or one ounce of rose-water; diluted muriatic acid, a teaspoonful; mix. This is to be used after washing.

Substitute for Coffee.

Scrape clean three or four good parsnips, cut them into thin slices, bake till well brown, grind or crush, and use in the same manner as coffee, from which it is scarcely distinguishable.

Browning for Cakes.

Half a pound of moist sugar, two ounces of butter; add a little water. Simmer till brown. A little of this mixture will give a rich color to cakes.

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FOR THE NEW YEAR!

We have already commenced to perfect our arrangements for the coming new year, at which time we shall vastly improve and beautify all of our publications. New type, new style, new heading, every thing will be made perfect and beautiful, in the typographical department, and especially in the contents of our journals. We are closing engagements with several new and talented contributors, and shall be able to say, in a few weeks, that no paper in this country can show so large and select a corps of talented assistants, engaged upon its columns, as our own. New papers are springing up every day, all over the country, but the public do not easily forget old favorites, or lose confidence in thoroughly established and completely successful publications. Be not deceived by flashy advertisements, or loud promises. Judge calmly for yourself, and remember that those who have been tried and approved, are the safest and best!

Enterprises which require extraordinary puffing, and immense expenditures in advertising, to sustain them, have little of real intrinsic value in themselves. The public do not require to be told on every page of the daily press, which miscellaneous journal or magazine they should purchase, they know their own taste best, and will select and adhere to those which in themselves present most that is really valuable and interesting. Our own journals were never more popular or prosperous than at the present moment, and this popularity has been sustained by putting labor, talent and money into the papers themselves, not by placarding the town, nor filling the daily press with flash advertisements, calculated to excite the curiosity of the inexperienced!

TO GET A RIFLE.—Leave your smooth-bored gun out doors over night—in the morning, it will be rifled.

PBX.—A lever, small enough to be used by any man, but strong enough to raise the whole world.

METAPHYSICS.—Words to stay the appetite till facts are ready. Feeling for a science in the dark.

UNTIMELY REFUSAL OF RELIEF.

A baker in Paris, a very charitable man, who had always, upon principle, a sous, or a roll, to bestow upon the poor, became at length so beset and imposed on, that weary of the visitation of the pauper host, he solemnly vowed he would never more relieve one of them. How often are we made, like Jephthah, to repent of rash vows! And not long after taking this, a miserable looking object presented himself at the baker's door, imploring a crust of bread for pity's sake—he was starving. "Starving, indeed!" cried the baker; "that's the old story. But I am not now to be so taken in. March, sirrah!—you'll get nothing here, I assure you!" The emaciated, miserable object crawled away; the baker had the curiosity to watch him, and saw, alas! that his tale had been but too true; for many steps he had not proceeded from this beneficent tradesman's now inhospitable door, ere he fell to the ground dead! So shocked was the good baker by this circumstance, that he opened his house to all beggars as before; and retracting his first vow, made another equally solemn, that none hereafter who applied to him for relief, should ever depart from his door without it.

DIFFIDENCE.—Douglas Jerrold says, Diffidence is an acquaintance that hourly picks your pocket; that makes you hob and nob with fustian, when otherwise you might jostle it with court ruffles.

INJUDICIOUS PRAISE.—The keenest abuse of our enemies will not hurt us so much, in the estimation of the discerning, as the injudicious praise of our friends.

MARRIED HAPPINESS.—Married happiness is a glass ball; folks play with it during the honeymoon, till falling, it is shivered to pieces; and the rest of life is a wrangle who broke it.

TOBACCO.—A triple memento mori dust for the nose, ashes for the mouth, poison for the stomach.

PROGRESS.—The goal of yesterday will be the starting-point of to-morrow.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The lands belonging to the United States have been acquired by deed of cession from some of the older States, and by treaty with other powers. They constitute a vast and invaluable domain, and have thus far, and in the future will be, the chief element in the growth and extension of the Union. Up to the present period, the quantity of lands sold by the government, amounts to about three hundred and sixty-four million acres. The proper and judicious management of this vast national possession has been one of the most serious subjects that have engaged the attention of statesmen. Occasionally wild schemes have been started for distributing these lands among the States, or of giving them away to settlers. This policy has thus far been successfully resisted; and the plan has obtained of disposing of the lands in moderate quantities, from time to time, as the wants of the country might require, and at prices so low as to bring them within the means of all enterprising and industrious persons. This plan, with the addition of the privilege of pre-emption in favor of actual settlers, as detailed by us in a recent number of the Flag, has worked admirably thus far, in facilitating the settlement and promoting the rapid growth of the new States and Territories. The demagogue scheme of giving away the lands for nothing, would work badly, by removing from the settler all stimulus to industry and thrift in procuring the means to purchase his land, and thus entailing upon the new States a class of idle and worthless squatters, in place of the energetic and frugal population that now contribute so materially to their growth and prosperity. Such a scheme would be a virtual abandonment of that care and control over the public lands, on the part of the government, which is so essential to the establishment of order and the preservation of peace in a newly settled region. It would, beside this, be a wanton sacrifice of an important and legitimate source of revenue to the general government, and to the extent of many millions of dollars, annually, render it necessary to increase the taxes upon foreign importations.

Of late years it has become quite common for interested parties to get up cunning contrivances for plundering the public of their lands, and to urge the same upon Congress, for adoption. Of this nature are the donations to railroad companies, which from time to time are engineered through Congress, under the pretence of promoting internal improvements. The real object of the parties interested is to get up a great rise on their stocks by means of the land grant, and then sell out and pocket a large profit by the rise. With this end in view, these sharpers can afford to pay well for lobby influence, to get their bills through Congress, and do pour out their money quite liberally, as the corruption investigations of the last Congress showed. Those investigations, by the way, although they resulted in the exposure and expulsion of several members of the House, were but a mere superficial affair, and did not begin to open the mass of corruption that lay buried beneath the acts of the thirty-third and thirty-fourth Congress. Had these iniquitous transactions been probed to the bottom, instead of being merely stirred up at the surface, blacker deeds would have been brought to light than any that were revealed, and other names implicated besides those of Matteson and his fellow-culprits.

CHROMATYPE.

This is one of the most recent processes, of really practical utility, in the art of photography. It consists in washing good letter paper with a solution composed of ten grains bichromate of potash, twenty grains sulphate of copper, one ounce of distilled water. Papers prepared with this are of a pale yellow color, and may be kept for any length of time without injury, and are always ready for use. For copying botanical specimens, or engravings, nothing can be more beautiful. After the paper has been exposed to the influence of sunshine, with the object to be superposed, it is washed over in the dark with a solution of nitrate of silver of moderate strength; as soon as this is done, a very vivid, positive picture makes its appearance, which then only requires washing in pure water.

A POPULAR FALLACY.—Many people fancy that a little fly is only little because it is young, and that it will grow up in process of time to be as big as a blue bottle. Now this idea is entirely wrong; for when an insect has once attained its winged state, it grows no more.

MINNESOTA.—The area of the new State of Minnesota is 78,000 miles, making it one of the largest States of the confederacy. One-fifth of it is water, as Minnesota is a State of small lakes.

TUSCAN INSOLENCE.—"When thou art buying a horse, or choosing a wife," says the Tuscan proverb, "shut thine eyes and commend thyself to God."

EARTH AND HEAVEN.—We go to the grave of a friend, saying, "A man is dead;" but angels throng about him, saying, "A man is born."

DEEP-SEA SOUNDINGS.

The depth of the ocean has ever been a subject of interesting speculation, and has excited all that interest in the human mind which attaches to the mysterious and unknown. Long ago, philosophers, by reasoning from analogy, arrived at the conclusion that the bed of the ocean, in its cavities, was a counterpart of the surface of the earth in its projections, and that the greatest depth of the former was probably about equal to the greatest height of mountains upon the latter. The truth of this opinion could not be verified to any considerable extent, until recently, owing to the impossibility of sounding at great depths with the old-fashioned line and plummet. The line would run out to any extent, and give no token that bottom had been reached; for the vibration of the shock caused by the lead striking bottom does not communicate itself through a very great length of line, and the under currents run out the line long after the bottom is reached.

A few years since, however, a plan of deep-sea soundings was introduced into the United States Navy, which promised better results. This plan consisted in the employment of a common twine thread for a sounding line, and a heavy cannon ball for a sinker, instead of the stout cord and leaden plummet formerly used. By this means, it was thought that the small line could be carried down straight without being affected by currents; and that by observing how much length of line was drawn out before the heavy weight ceased to draw, the depth could be correctly ascertained. Each sounding, upon this plan, involved the expenditure of a weight and line, for they could not be drawn up again, on account of the weakness of the small thread. But this was a trivial expense, when compared with the important object to be gained. In practice, this plan sometimes worked well, but the enormous depths that were occasionally indicated, led to serious doubts whether even this little thread was not drawn out by currents after the ball had taken bottom. With this apparatus, Lieut. Walsh, of the United States schooner "Taney," reported a cast of thirty-four thousand feet, without bottom; Lieut. Berryman, of the "Dolphin," one of thirty-nine thousand feet, and no bottom; Capt. Denham, of the British Navy, reported bottom in the South Atlantic at a depth of forty-six thousand feet; and Lieut. Parker, of the U. S. frigate "Congress," soon afterwards ran out fifty thousand feet in the same region, without finding bottom. These marvellous results showed that the obstacles to accurate sounding had not yet been overcome, and that something was still wanting to distinguish the action of under currents in drawing out the line, from that of gravity. This deficiency was supplied by the discovery of the law of descent which governs this sinking of the weight in the ocean; and by always using a line of the same size, material and construction, and a sinker of the same shape and weight, the sounders were enabled to distinguish the action of gravity from that of currents, and make their calculations.

This law of descent shows a regularly decreasing ratio of speed for each hundred fathoms reeled out; and therefore by noting the depth reached, and the rate of movement of the line, it is easy to determine whether the action is due to the gravitation of the weight, or to the lateral action of currents upon the line, after the ball has touched bottom. In the former case, the rate of movement is continually decreasing, in the latter it is uniform. The application of this discovery to the process of deep-sea sounding, showed that the enormous depths of the sea at the places indicated by the officers above named, were not true, but that the appearance was attributable to current action. Under this improved system of soundings it does not appear that any part of the Atlantic Ocean hitherto fathomed has a greater depth than twenty-five thousand feet, and the deepest portion is probably between the parallels of thirty-five and forty degrees north latitude, directly south of the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. The tract lying between Newfoundland and Ireland, over which the route of the telegraph cable proceeds, is comparatively an elevated plateau, the average depth of which for the greater part of its extent, is about ten thousand feet; the deepest portion being only about twelve thousand five hundred feet in depth, and that, midway between the two coasts. The soundings for the whole telegraph route were made by Lieut. Berryman, on board the U. S. steamer Arctic, in the summer of 1856, and specimens from the bottom were brought up.

Material from the bottom of the deep sea is procured by an ingenious contrivance of Lieut. Brooke, U. S. N., whereby a light, hollow cylinder is carried down with the cannon-ball at the end of the sounding line, filled with the material of which the bottom is composed, and drawn up again by the line, the ball itself being detached upon reaching bottom, by the combined action of levers and slings. By this admirable apparatus a double purpose is subserved, viz., ascertaining the depth of the sea, and also the nature of the bottom. From the deepest portion of the telegraph plateau, Lieut. Berryman brought up specimens of the bottom, which though appearing to the eye to be clay, were found upon inspection with the microscope, to be composed entirely of minute shells, without a particle of sand or gravel among them. Upon a bed of this soft and yielding material, far beneath the reach of grinding icebergs, and free from the chafing action of the upper sea, the Atlantic telegraph cable will repose in security; giving through its throbbing pulses the messages from one continent to another. The deep-sea soundings of the American navy have discovered and exposed this secure bed for the telegraph wire, and demonstrated its adaptation for the purpose; and in doing this, the navy has won for itself a crown of honor of which her gallant and accomplished officers may well be proud.

UNIQUE PUBLICATION.

An unique work has appeared in London, prepared by Professor Smyth, Her Majesty's Astronomer for Scotland. It is called "Teneriffe: An Astronomer's Experiment; or, Specialities of a Residence above the Clouds." It is illustrated with stereoscopic pictures, and is accompanied with a stereoscope. The London Examiner gives the volume a very complimentary notice, and says: "The special interest of this work lies in the fact that it supplies the first example of the application of the principle of the stereoscope to book illustration. Nearly all the pictures have been taken at heights from seven to twelve thousand feet above the level of the sea; and on the lower ground, we are shown a dragon-tree walk, a cactus-garden, cochineal-gatherers at work, and other scenes never before realized in this manner to eyes in England."

A LONG THEATRICAL ROW.—A gentleman, named Rene Perin, an old dramatist and editor, lately died in Paris at the age of eighty-five, having survived his reputation as an author. One of his most noted pieces was played two hundred nights in succession, and every night the dandies of the city, who were outraged at the word muscadin, applied to a representative of their class in the piece, mustered in strong force at the theatre, armed with sticks to chastise the actors. They, too, armed themselves in a similar manner, and every night there was a fight between the parties. Not much damage was done, and the excitement filled the theatre.

QUICK TIME.—A gentleman was one day arranging music for a young lady to whom he was paying his addresses. "Pray, Miss D." said he, "what time do you prefer?" "O," she replied, carelessly, "any time will do; but the quicker the better."

WHAT FEMALE EDUCATION SHOULD BE.

The first maxim in intellectual training is, that clever children are sure to be clever, and stupid children to be stupid; and the second is, that the only cleverness of any use in a child, is that which can be continued into maturer life. It follows that the great thing is to ascertain what all children, clever or stupid, can and ought to learn, and then to allow the clever only to go beyond; while care is taken that their cleverness shall be both judged and directed by the probability of its ultimate result. Now, what ought all young ladies to learn? First, to speak and write English correctly, and to read it aloud clearly and fluently. Next, to do plain needlework. It is a great mistake to think that wealth can supersede the necessity for this. In the first place, this is the most feminine of occupations; next, it affords even the stupidest person an opportunity of doing one thing well without being attracted by the display that usually attends excellence; and lastly, it is a most valuable preparation for a useful intercourse with the poor. Then must come the rudiments of history, geography and ciphering, and as much French as the natural ability of the student renders possible. Nothing more is necessary, except dancing—all else should depend upon natural gifts and personal tastes. Scarcely any woman can ever be so learned or clever, that it becomes a matter of indifference whether she is also good-looking; yet she may easily acquire a proficiency which will be a source of genuine satisfaction to herself and her friends. It must, however, be conceded that it is not possible to range all girls under the head of stupid or clever, and that some common ground of general education is wanted, which shall test, awaken, and develop their powers as they grow into young women. Incomparably the best instrument for meeting this want, is to be found in the study of standard English literature. Accomplishments are quite a secondary matter. If men do not get tired of the songs, they soon get tired of the singer, if she can do nothing but sing. What is really wanted in a woman, is that she should be a permanently pleasant companion. So far as education can give or enhance pleasantness, it does so by making the view of life wide, the wit ready, the faculty of comprehension vivid; and the only trustworthy engine of education directed to this end is an honest and intimate familiarity with great authors.

A FINE SIGHT.—Douglas Jerrold said there was no finer sight than a stream of human creatures passing from a Christian church.

JAMES SMITHSON.

Among the greatest English benefactors of our country will be classed James Smithson, Esq., of London, a natural son of a former Duke of Northumberland, who died some twenty-three years ago, bequeathing over half a million of dollars to the United States government, for the purpose of founding a national institution at Washington, "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." Smithson was a single man, without family ties, and an accomplished natural philosopher. In the course of his scientific career he contributed several important papers to the Royal Society of London, of which he was a member. In his will, he speaks in the highest terms of the United States; and considering this country the most favorable for the accomplishment of his object, to advance the cause of science, he confers upon it the honorable trust of dispensing his fortune to that end, rather than his native land. Congress accepted the trust in 1846, and constituted a board of regents to administer the same, according to the intention of the donor. With a portion of the income accruing from the bequest, an Institute has been erected at the city of Washington, in sight of and near to the national monument of Washington. This building, which is constructed of brown free-stone, in the Norman Gothic style, cost three hundred twenty-five thousand dollars. It consists of a central body and two wings, and is adorned with a number of towers. The whole structure is spacious and imposing, forming a graceful monument to the memory of Smithson, and at the same time furnishing ample accommodations for the business of the institution. This business consists in the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men. To accomplish the former, scientific men in all parts of the country are induced to contribute the results of their observation and investigations, which are gathered together under the supervision of Professor Henry, the resident secretary of the institution, and so far as useful, prepared for the press, and published in the volumes of "The Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge." Scientific researches are also carried on at the Institute, by competent persons, aided by the use of excellent chemical and other philosophical apparatus, and a very extensive and complete library of works on natural science, embracing the productions of the ablest writers of every nation. Particular attention is given to the new pursuit of meteorological investigations, and regular observations are received from all parts of the country, as to the state of the thermometer and barometer, and the commencement, progress and duration of storms. Upwards of two hundred and fifty reliable persons are engaged in communicating these observations, and it is anticipated that the results thereof will prove in the highest degree beneficial, in systematizing and improving the business of agriculture.

For the diffusion of knowledge, the valuable library of the institution, containing works of the rarest character, and constantly improving by the addition of new works, is open to all. The plan of this library contemplates the collection in one large room, of all the best scientific knowledge of the world, so that it may be readily accessible to students. The publications of this institution, which have already reached nine quarto volumes, and the printed reports which are annually made to Congress, are distributed liberally in this and other countries; and in return, the transactions of foreign and domestic societies are received and added to the library. There is also an extensive gallery of Indian portraits of members of the various tribes on the continent, which is receiving additions from time to time, and is intended to be a complete ethnological gallery of the primitive races. Courses of scientific lectures upon various subjects are delivered every winter during the sessions of Congress, by able professors who are employed for the purpose by the government of the institution. These lectures are free to all, and are delivered in a spacious lecture room of the building, well adapted for the purpose. In one large hall is contained a very extensive collection of curiosities in nature and art, which have been brought home by government officers from the various exploring expeditions; in another, is a variety of useful and curious philosophical apparatus, including a sulphuric-acid barometer, twenty-one feet in height, and in a room adjoining the large central hall, are preserved the personal effects of Smithson, such as his service of silver plate, family pictures, and philosophical instruments.

The noble bequest of Smithson yields an annual income of thirty thousand dollars, which is devoted to the various purposes indicated above, for carrying on the institution which bears his name. The expenses of the establishment are, to some extent, defrayed by annual appropriations by Congress, leaving a larger sum from the income to be devoted to the cause of science, than would otherwise be available. All the expense thus far incurred, except that which Congress provides for, has been paid out of the income of the fund, leaving the principal untouched, and a surplus of interest amounting at the present time to one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. The great design of the donor, is therefore in a fair way of being accomplished, without wasting the means so munificently provided by him for carrying it out. The help which he has given to the cause of science is invaluable, and promises the most important and beneficial results in the future, in which not only our own country but the world at large will participate. With the hundred thousand pounds which he has entrusted to our country, he has laid the foundation of a monument that will perpetuate his name for ages to come, and blend it in honorable union with the ever-advancing triumphs of the human intellect.

INVENTION OF BALLOONS.

The admirers of crinoline will be proud to learn that the invention of balloons is owing to a similar contrivance. The French give a curious anecdote of a simple occurrence which led the inventor of such machines—Montgolfier—to turn his attention to the subject. It is to this effect: A washerwoman of the Rue aux Juifs, in the Marais, placed a petticoat on a basket-work frame, over a stove, to dry. In order to concentrate all the heat, and to prevent its escaping by the aperture at the top, she drew the strings closely together which are used to tie it round the waist. By degrees the stuff dried, became lighter, and the stove continuing to heat and rarify the air concentrated under the frame-work, the petticoat began to move, and at last rose in the air. The washerwoman was so astonished that she ran out to call her neighbors; and they, seeing it suspended in the air, were amazed. One individual, however, a simple paper-maker from Annonay, named Montgolfier, as much astonished but more sensible than the others, returned home, and without loss of time, studied the work of Priestly on different kinds of atmospheres. The result was the discovery of the first balloon, called Montgolfier's, of which he was the inventor. As the nautilus probably gave the idea of a sailing vessel, so also do very simple causes often produce great and unexpected results.

ABOUT GEESE.—One Mr. Lane is terribly severe on geese for their hissing every one that passes them. Yet a Michaelmas goose hissing hot from the spit, is no contemptible bird.

THE POOR WIDOW.—The Tribune tells a story of a widow with four children in New York, who gets only nine shillings a dozen for making shirts.

THE FIRST SCULPTRESS.

Sabina Von Steinbach was daughter to the great architect of the Cathedral of Strasbourg. From early childhood she displayed considerable talent in modelling, and it was to her that her father entrusted much of the ornamental part of his stupendous undertaking. Few, as they pause before the groups on the portal of the southern aisle, and admire their grace and beauty, imagine that they are the work of a girl of twenty! Tradition says, that, by the command of the Archbishop, Sabina herself attended to see the statues deposited in their destined niches; and that the prelate, followed by all his priests, came forth to meet her, and placed upon her brow a garland of laurel, consecrated by his own hand.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.—One number more will close volume eight, for the present year, and we shall commence the new volume for 1859 with a renewed purpose of excellence and increased value in our popular magazine. After publishing eight volumes, we have brought the Dollar Monthly to a degree of perfection which has carried with it the most flattering success. In the former years which the Magazine has been issued, it has gradually increased in circulation, until there is but one monthly in the country which issues so large an edition. Show a copy to your neighbors, and let them see what a delightful monthly visitor they can ensure to their families for one dollar a year!

OIL AND BUTTER.—Perhaps our readers don't know that the people of the south of France are very fond of olive oil, and use it instead of butter, which they despise. Well, an inhabitant of Provence, on the eve of going to Paris, told a neighbor that he meant to have his portrait painted there.

"In what style?"

"O, an oil painting, of course."

"Then," replied the other, "I advise you to carry the oil with you, for in that rascally city, they tell me they do everything with butter."

THE GREATER CRIME.—If thou art but a dunce, Heaven will forgive thee, for it has not given thee wisdom; but if thou art not honest, begone!

POVERTY'S DARTS.—Of all the arrows shot at our miserable nature, is there one not made the keener if whetted on the poor man's hearth?

DIET.—A regular diet up to the point of temperance cures more people than physic.

Foreign Miscellany.

The Crystal Palace, England, has established a separate court for exhibition of British sculpture.

Three petticoats lined with cigars were lately taken from a female smuggler from France.

The Duke of Wellington's sarcophagus has been exhibited for sixpence in St. Paul's, London.

A man lately jumped from the top of the July column in Paris and was instantly killed.

There is a coal pit in Cheshire, England, the shaft of which is 686 1-2 yards deep.

There are about five hundred vessels of all sizes in the British navy.

The emigration from Ireland averages at the present time 100,000 per year.

At Birmingham, England, eight tons of wire per week are made into hooks and eyes.

A communication in the London Times suggests that the British government should purchase the Great Eastern steamer for the navy.

The Czar of Russia has authorized those of his serfs who can pay forty roubles to rank as free citizens.

The Marquis of Queensberry, better known as Viscount Drumlanrig, lately shot himself while hunting.

Louisa Pyne, the English opera singer, has made a fortune of not far from one hundred thousand dollars in three years.

The London Times believes the establishment of the Atlantic Telegraph to be a guaranty of peace between the two countries.

The French are not such coffee-drinkers as many people suppose. The United States use eight or nine times as much as France.

It is estimated that the Yang-tse Kiang, the largest river in China, is larger than our Mississippi. It is one hundred miles longer.

Several of the bishops of the established church in England are urging on their clergy the importance of practising extemporaneous preaching, to reach the hearts of the people.

The Jews of London intend to present to Lady John Russell a boudoir suite, consisting of a table and four chairs, composed of solid silver, as a mark of their sense of the obligation they owe to her husband.

The public debt of England is about eight hundred millions of pounds sterling (£800,000,000) and the number of stockholders in it is two hundred and sixty-nine thousand seven hundred and thirty six (269,736.)

Great Britain has invested in railroads, since 1839, three hundred millions pounds sterling (£300,000,000.) The gross earnings of her railroads last year were twenty-four millions (£24,000,000) and the declared dividends thirteen millions (£13,000,000.)

There are forty-six persons in England who have incomes of £450,000 a year, equal to two millions and a quarter dollars, while four hundred and forty-four persons have incomes ranging from fifty to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year, and eight hundred and eleven from twenty-five to fifty thousand.

There are said to be 803 nunneries in Spain, with 20,018 nuns in them.

The queen of Spain has declared her intention of founding nine great asylums for the poor.

The Imperial Horticultural Society of Paris have announced their intention of holding a great exhibition, open to all nations.

Madame Champagneux died lately in Paris, aged 77. She was the only child of the celebrated Madame Roland, who perished on the scaffold during the French Revolution.

The Turkish colonel who refused to interfere in behalf of the French and English consuls at the late massacre in Jeddah, has been degraded to the ranks and sent to a distant province.

The first vocal prize at the annual competition of the students of the Conservatoire of Paris, was lately won by a young Scotchwoman, Miss Augusta Thompson, of Glasgow.

There are 14 general hospitals in London which possess an income from realized property of £109,687. There are also 36 special hospitals, possessing an aggregate income of £117,218.

The country people who visit London spend something like £11,000,000 per annum in it—the profit on the expenditure paying the whole of the local rates of London, and at least half a million toward rent.

A ukase has been promulgated, prohibiting the teaching of the Latin tongue in all the colleges of the Russian empire. The hours hitherto devoted to that study will be devoted to the positive sciences.

The deepest coal pit in Great Britain, and probably in the world, has, after nearly twelve years' labor, been completed and opened at Duckinfield, Cheshire. The shaft of this pit is 686 1-2 yards deep, and the sinking of it cost nearly £100,000.

Walter Savage Landor, of world-wide literary fame, has been convicted at Bristol of a series of atrocious and disgusting libels upon a lady of Bath, named Yescombe, who, though formerly a friend of his, had in some way offended him. He was mulcted in damages $1000 and costs.

At a meeting of the Great Eastern Steamship Company, it was resolved to receive offers for the purchase or charter of the ship, and to advertise her for sale at auction, and in the meantime to endeavor to raise money by mortgage.

The American company which undertook to raise the ships at Sebastopol, has failed. They raised one Turkish steamer, which was rotten. The Russian ships being of green wood, are probably in the same state. Their masts are gradually disappearing.

Persons in England who leave railroad cars while trains are in motion, are subject to legal penalties. A lady was fined five shillings, and five shillings costs, a few weeks ago, for having stepped out of a train on the Crystal Palace line before the cars had stopped.

In Australia the Methodists have 670 churches and 683 other preaching stations. Communicants, upwards of 25,000; attendants on the divine worship, nearly 150,000. The number of children in the week-day and Sabbath schools is 53,559.

Record of the Times.

The New Yorkers daily spend 10,000 dollars in cigars, and 8500 in bread.

Tuckerman, the bank robber, is employed in the Conn. state prison wrapping joiners' planes.

A New England farmer can make more money by raising cots than in any other way.

Dr. Abiel A. Cooley, who died recently at Hartford, was the inventor of lucifer matches.

Cyrus W. Field crossed the Atlantic twenty-one times on business of the telegraph company.

A crinolined lady in a 4th Avenue car, New York, honestly paid for four seats lately.

The rooster on top of the flag staff on Worcester Common is 192 1-2 feet from the ground. This is the highest flag staff in the United States.

A new route for an Atlantic cable has been already pointed out; it is through the Bermudas and Fayal to Portugal.

Recently, a man named Myers, was respited by the Governor of Ohio, just as the sheriff was about to prepare him for the scaffold.

The new style of bonnet is a unique affair, and resembles a cabbage leaf trimmed with tomatoes. The price is cheap—only thirty dollars.

According to a computation recently made, there are about 6000 Israelites in Cincinnati. They are principally engaged in trade.

The New Bedford Standard reports that the father of a lady in that vicinity recently presented to her a check for $30,000, in view of her matrimonial alliance.

A liquor dealer in Cincinnati recently received an order from a Roman Catholic institution, to send "ten gallons of the best old Bourbon whiskey, and charge the same to the Church of the Mother of God."

M. Jullien is not coming to this country as announced, it seems. His arrangements for the fall and winter campaign are already made, and he will give his concerts at the Lyceum Theatre, London—the scene of his early triumphs.

Eleven persons in West Falmouth, living within a circuit of three and a half miles, recently met together, whose united ages were 897 years. The average was 81 years. Among them were three married couples.

The aggregate loss of cable by the Atlantic Telegraph Company during their several expeditions was about three hundred miles, which cost upwards of one hundred and forty thousand dollars.

The doctors' fee in New Orleans for a yellow fever case is one hundred dollars, more or less, kill or cure. If taken in season the doctor's attention is not required after the fourth day. One, two and three thousand dollars a week is no uncommon amount of fees for a good yellow fever physician.

Judging from the following notice, from an exchange of a bank in Minnesota, the money in that State must be rather below par: "It may be proper to add that a bushel of notes are traded for an iron spoon at the place issued, and gradually lose their value while travelling to remote sections of the country."

The average product of one acre of strawberries in California, is about half a ton.

The experiment of growing tobacco in Minnesota has proved quite successful—a heavy crop being anticipated this year.

The folly of one man is the fortune of another; and no man prospers so suddenly as by the errors of others.

The "Rainbow," a steel ship of one hundred and sixty tons, was lately launched from Mr. Laird's works on the Mersey, which is intended for the navigation of the Niger.

The stump of the old Charter Oak has been dug up and sold to a speculator, and the place is cut up for building lots. It is a shame the State did not buy the land and build a State House on the spot.

The notorious horse, Cruiser, which, next to the zebra, was supposed to present the most insuperable difficulties to the horse-tamer Rarey, is announced to appear at the Alhambra, says a London paper, as a circus performer.

The Troy Whig says there is residing in that city a young mechanic, who claims to have constructed a telegraph apparatus which will transmit words with twice the velocity that the Hughes instrument is capable of.

A two story passenger car has been invented at Philadelphia. The upper story is reached by a small winding staircase from below. It is not accessible to passengers in crinoline, but is intended for the use of smokers.

Potatoes are said to have been first planted in New England in 1719 by the Londonderry (N. H.) settlers, who, embracing sixteen families, put their first crop in the ground in May, upon a ridge of land now lying in the western part of Derry.

Memphis, Tennessee, is a fast place, and no mistake. The other day, Judge E. W. M. King was arraigned before the Recorder for carrying concealed weapons. He pleaded in defence that he had no concealed weapons, they being all outside his clothes. The Recorder then fined him $10 for disorderly conduct, in appearing on the streets with weapons exposed about his person.

By the "act abolishing arrest in civil actions," etc., passed during the last session of Parliament, imprisonment for debt is virtually abolished in Canada. The effect will be to empty the jails in Upper Canada of debtors. Now almost every jail contains debtors, many of them large numbers.

A lad named William Rodgers, aged fifteen years, committed suicide in Blackville, Green Co., Pa., a few days ago, by hanging himself in a clearing near his father's house. The only cause assigned for the rash act is the fact that his father whipped him a short time previously for racing a valuable horse.

A young lady, eighteen or nineteen years of age, daughter of Mr. Haywood, gardener of John Jacob Astor, Jr., at Escopus, near Rondout, N. Y., died recently from the effects of fright. She was riding in a wagon, when the horse took fright and ran with great speed for about a mile, when he was stopped. The young woman was taken from the wagon in a dying condition, and lived but a few minutes.

Merry-Making.

A French comedian is out with a farce entitled "A Journey Round my Wife."

Demijohns are known by the more refined term, "spirit wrappers."

The gentleman who has been trying to raise the wind, finds himself blown all over town.

Some writer says that the word would in Rufus Choate's hand writing, resembles a small grid-iron struck by lightning.

Why had a man better lose his arm than a leg? Because in losing his leg, he loses something "to boot."

A wag about town says the head-coverings the ladies wear now-a-days, are bare faced falsehoods.

There is a man at Brixton so fat, that a child was recently killed by his shadow falling upon him.

An Irish servant girl, after reading the queen's message, Tuesday, said: "Faith, an' shure, an' was it for fear of breakin' the cable that the queen made it so short?"

An editor in Iowa, is said to have become so hollow from depending on the printing business alone for bread, that he proposes to sell himself for stove-pipe, at three cents a foot.

The Hartford Times suggests that those who cannot obtain a cable charm to wear, might take as a substitute, a four-pound weight, a string of sausages, or some other similar trifle.

An Arkansas editor complains that for some time past, his town has been "filled with fishermen and loafers," and wonders "what they are after." After loaves and fishes, no doubt.

An exchange speaks of a chap with feet so large, that when it rains, or when he wants to get in the shade, he lies down on his back, and holds up one foot. It fully answers the purpose of an umbrella.

It is stated upon the authority of those who have heard it, that a cat, when her tail is pinched between a door and post, utters the vowels, a, e, i, o, u, with great distinctness. If the injury is prolonged, she gives w and y.

"So, you would not take me to be twenty?" said a young lady to her partner, while dancing the polka, a few evenings ago; "what would you take me for?" "For better, for worse," replied he.

To an impertinent fellow, whom Jerrold avoided, and who attempted to intrude himself by saying a bright thing, Jerrold said, sharply turning upon the intruder, "You're like lead, sir, bright only when you're cut."

Some of the farms of Vermont stand so much on their edge, that plowmen with one short leg command double wages. Citizens who distinguished themselves in the late war with Mexico will please notice.

Said a runner to a competitor, before a whole depot full of bystanders: "I knew you when you used to hire your children to go to bed without their supper, and after they got to sleep you'd go up and steal their pennies, to hire 'em with 'em in next night!"

A man recently walked two days running, and was weak a fortnight afterwards.

Why are temperance societies a bar to friendship? Because they prevent shaking hands.

Squibbs wants to know whether doctors, by looking at the tongue of a wagon, can tell what ails it.

Why are ladies like bells? Because you can never find out their metal until you have given them a ring.

An Irishman complained of his physician, that he stuffed him so much with drugs that he was sick after he got well.

It was observed of a celebrated physician, that he never said in company, "I drink your health," but "my service to you, sir."

In a book recently published in London, camel riding is compared to "being in a swing twenty feet from the ground."

Mrs. Partington, speaking of the rapid manner in which deeds are perpetrated, said that it only required two seconds to fight a duel.

Why is an invalid, cured by sea-bathing, like a confined criminal? Because he is sea-cured (secured).

A waggish candidate, coming in the course of his canvass to a tailor's shop—"What we look for here," said he, "are measures, not men."

Gold sweaters are undoubtedly very dishonest people, but they make money out of it. Can there, however, we ask with all solemnity, be any excuse for copper boilers? We pause for a reply.

What is that which, supposing its greatest breadth to be four inches, length nine inches, and depth three inches, contains a solid foot? A shoe.

A friend of ours the other night discovered a fellow stealing his coal. The thief, observing our friend, but thinking himself unobserved, stole away.

We see the question discussed in several eastern papers, "whether a school-master can kiss his female pupils." We only know that we could when we were a school-master.

A young lady lately appeared in male attire in Baltimore; and one of the editors says her disguise was so perfect that she might have passed for a man, "had she a little more modesty."

A gentleman who has a scolding wife, in answer to an inquiry after her health, said she was pretty well, only subject at times to a "breaking out in the mouth."

An Indiana paper refuses to publish eulogies gratis, but adds: "We will publish the simple announcement of the death of any of our friends with pleasure."

In order to ease the labor of milking the cows, the Swiss maids sit on little low stools, which they carry about with them ready strapped to their person, producing an effect more characteristic than poetical.

GIVEN AWAY.

Any person desiring to see a copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, the favorite illustrated weekly journal, has only to address us a line to that effect, and a copy will be sent by return of mail, full of elegant engravings, free of charge.
M. M. BALLOU, Boston, Mass.

DOG DAYS.

DEDICATED TO ALL INTENDING PROPRIETORS OF THAT FAITHFUL ANIMAL.

Young Foodle, a great but not lucky sportsman, buys a trained dog of wonderful character.

Prospect of Mr. Foodle on the road home with the animal.

Which proves its ability to the fullest satisfaction when Foodle takes him out again,

And remains staunch to his game.

As a watch-dog also he is unrivalled.

But as we are all subject to misfortunes, so the dog has a fit.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

Of which he is completely cured by a negro, who understands all that sort of thing.

The dog's temper is not improved by the operation, and he takes it out, when they meet Foodle's lady-love and her pet.

Foodle licks him in wrath,

And the animal exhibits its accomplishments in another line

Not appreciated by the public functionaries,

By whom Foodle is arrested, at the instance of an irascible old gent, who declares the dog was stolen from his house.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. VIII.—No. 6. BOSTON, DECEMBER, 1858. WHOLE No. 48.

ROUND THE WORLD.

In the following article we present the readers of the Magazine with a series of highly interesting pictures, embracing views and characters in Japan, China, Borneo, Cape Town, the Sandwich Islands, etc., drawn expressly for us by an officer of the United States steam frigate Powhatan. Though not the work of a professional artist, these designs have the rare merit of fidelity, and an air of great naturalness and spirit. They present some of the most striking incidents of a voyage round the world. Many of them delineate scenes in Japan; and of this country we shall first speak, not only from its intrinsic importance, but because it attracts great attention from the recent treaty, which, it is hoped, will lead to a permanent and profitable increase of our commercial facilities. The settlement of California, the trade from thence to China, and the idea of steam communication with the Pacific, involving the necessity of supplies of coal, together with the increase of the whale fishery in the Japanese seas, produced a desire on the part of this country to establish commercial intercourse with that great eastern empire, the ports of which had formerly been open to European trade, but of late had been jealously closed by an exclusive policy characteristic of its government. Previous attempts at intercourse, and previous difficulties, having given our government an insight into the character of the Japanese, it was resolved to send a strong squadron to Japan, in order that its appearance might command the respect which would not be accorded to an inferior force. The commander selected for the expedition was Commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry, a gentleman in every way fitted for responsibility and success. The objects of the expedition were defined in a letter from the Secretary of State to the Secretary of the Navy, as follows:—1. "To effect some permanent arrangement for the protection of American seamen or property wrecked on these islands, or driven into their ports by stress of weather (shipwrecked mariners having been habitually treated with great barbarity by the Japanese). 2. The permission to American vessels to enter one or more of their ports, in order to obtain supplies of provisions, water, fuel, etc., or, in case of disasters, to refit so as to enable them to prosecute their voyage. It is very desirable to have permission to establish a depot for coal, if not on one of the principal islands, at least on some small, uninhabited one, of which it is said there are several in the vicinity. 3. The permission to our vessels to enter one or more of their ports for the purpose of disposing of their cargoes by sale or barter." A letter to the emperor of Japan, to be signed by the president of the United States, was prepared by Daniel Webster. The expedition did not sail, however, until after Mr. Webster's death; when another letter was prepared, and signed by Mr. Fillmore, the president, and Edward Everett, Secretary of State, Nov. 13, 1852. The letter was splendidly engrossed, and enclosed in a gold box of the value of a thousand dollars.

Commodore Perry sailed from the United States, in the steam frigate Mississippi, towards the close of the year 1852, touched at Madeira and the Cape of Good Hope, reached Hong Kong in April, 1853, and thence sailed for Japan. After uniting all the vessels of the squadron, Perry, leading the fleet in the flag-ship Susquehanna (steam frigate), made Cape Idsu on the 8th of July. Their first anchorage and intercourse with the natives was near the town of Urugawa. On the 14th, the Prince Iwami gave Commodore Perry a formal reception on shore, and took charge of the president's letter to the emperor. On the 17th, after surveying and sounding the bay and coasts, the squadron took its departure and spent the remainder of the year on the China coast. On the 12th of February, 1854, Commodore Perry re-appeared in the Bay of Jeddo, with three steam frigates, four sloops-of-war, and two store-ships. They anchored at the American anchorage. Some time was spent in settling upon a place of meeting with the Imperial commissioners and the village of Yokahama, containing about 10,000 persons, and just opposite the anchorage, was finally assigned. The fleet accordingly drew in shore, and moored in a line five miles in length, with their broadsides bearing on the shore. During the whole course of the negotiations, Commodore Perry had conducted himself with prudence and dignity. He had protested against being subjected to the ordinary system of espionage adopted towards foreigners by the Japanese, had disregarded their orders to suspend his sound, ings and surveyings, and while insisting upon nothing unreasonable, plainly declared, like General Jackson, that he would submit to nothing wrong.

"On the 8th of March," says an officer of the Vandalia, writing to the New York Journal of Commerce, "the day appointed for the first meeting, about nine hundred officers, seamen and

Japanese soldiers crowded the shore and neighboring heights, looking on with a good deal of curiosity and interest. The house was nothing but a plain frame building, hastily put up, containing one large room—the audience hall—and several smaller ones for the convenience of attendants, etc. The floor was covered with mats, and very pretty painted screens adorned the marines, armed to the teeth, landed, and with drums beating and colors flying, were drawn upon the beach, ready to receive the commodore. As soon as he stepped on shore, the bands struck up, salutes were fired, and, followed by a long escort of officers, he marched up between the lines and entered the house erected by the Japanese expressly for the occasion. Thousands of sides. Long tables and benches, covered with red woolen stuff, placed parallel to each other, three handsome braziers, filled with burning charcoal, on the floor between them, and a few violet-colored crape hangings suspended from the ceiling, completed the furniture of the room. As we entered, we took our seats at one of the tables. The Japanese commissioners soon came in and placed themselves opposite to us at the other table; while behind us both, seated on the floor on their knees (their usual position, for they do not use chairs), was a crowd of Japanese officers, forming the train of the commissioners. The business was carried on in the Dutch language, through interpreters, of whom they have several who speak very well, and two or three in rank, before it could reach the commissioners, every one bowing his forehead to the floor before he addressed his superior. Refreshments were served in elegantly lacquered dishes—first of all, tea, which, as in China, is the constant beverage; then different kinds of candy and sponge cake (they are excellent confectioners and very fond of sugar); lastly, oranges and a palatable liquor, who speak a little English; they were on their knees, between the commissioners and the commodore. Our interpreter was seated by the side of the latter. It was curious to see the intolerable ceremony observed by them—quite humiliating to a democratic republican. A question proposed had to pass first through the interpreters, and then through several officers ascending distilled from rice, called by the Japanese saki. A flimsy banquet like this was not very agreeable to such hungry individuals as we, and we were the more disappointed, for the Japanese using only chopsticks, we had, previously to coming ashore, taken the precaution, as we shrewdly thought, to provide ourselves with knives and forks. Imagine, then, our chagrin, when finding nothing substantial on which to employ them. What was left on our plates was wrapped in paper, and given to us to carry away, according to the usual custom in Japan.

A JAPANESE FUNERAL.

A JAPANESE PALANQUIN.

"The commissioners were intelligent looking men, richly dressed in gay, silk petticoat pantaloons, and upper garments resembling in shape ladies' short gowns. Dark colored stockings, minating about half way between the apex and the forehead. It is a very comfortable fashion, and, were it not for the quantity of grease used in dressing it, would be a very cleanly one. Two audiences a week were held, at which the same programme was performed as related above, except that we fared more luxuriously. Becoming better acquainted with our taste, they feasted and two elegant swords, pushed through a twisted silk girdle, finished the costume. Straw sandals are worn, but are always slipped off on entering a house. They do not cover the head, the top and front part of which is shaved, and the back and side hair, being brought up, is tied so as to form a tail, three or four inches long, that extends forward upon the bald pate, terus with a broth made of fish, boiled shrimps, and boiled eggs, and very good raw oysters. At one of the interviews (March 13), the presents from our government were delivered. They consisted of cloths, agricultural implements, fire-arms, etc., and a beautiful locomotive, tender, and passenger car, one fourth the ordinary size, which we put in motion on a circular track, at the rate of twenty miles an hour. A mile of magnetic telegraph was also erected on shore, and put in operation. The Japanese were more interested in it than anything else, but never manifested any wonder. So capable are they of concealing and controlling their feelings, that they would examine the guns, machinery, etc., of the steamers, without expressing the slightest astonishbeing delivered to the imperial commissioners. Article first of the treaty establishes peace and amity between the United States and Japan; article second assigns the ports of Simoda, in the principality of Idzu, and of Hakodade, in the principality of Matsmai, for the reception of American ships where they can receive wood, water, provisions and coal—payment to be made ment. They are a much finer looking race than the Chinese—intelligent, polite, and hospitable, but proud, licentious, unforgiving and revengeful." At length, after much diplomacy on the part of the Japanese, the treaty was signed—three copies in Japanese being delivered to Commodore Perry, and three copies in English, signed by himself, with Dutch and Chinese translations, in gold and silver; articles third, fourth and fifth provide for the good treatment, security of property, etc., to American vessels and crews shipwrecked on the coast; article seventh we quote entire, as it has recently been a subject of dispute: "It is agreed that ships of the United States resorting to the ports open to them, shall be permitted to exchange gold and silver coin, and articles of goods, for other articles of goods, under such regulations as shall be temporarily established by the Japanese government for that purpose. It is stipulated, however, that the ships of the United States shall be permitted to carry away whatever articles they are willing to exchange." The above are the most important articles of the treaty.

DINNER OF JAPANESE OFFICERS ON BOARD U. S. SHIP POWHATAN.

CHINESE TAMKA BOAT.

use is abundantly supplied by numerous brooks. The Japanese vessels generally anchor at Kakizaki, a small village opposite Simoda. The town contains eight large temples, and a vast number of small chapels. The scenery is described as bold and romantic, swelling inland till it reaches a range of barren mountains, about three thousand feet high. The officers of the expedition

J. G. S. 1854

Our first illustration represents a Japanese funeral at Simoda. Simoda is situated near Cape Fugu, sixty miles from Point Sagami, at the entrance of the bay of Yedo. It has an excellent harbor, well sheltered by high hills. The town contains about a thousand houses, built on the banks of a beautiful stream at the northwest end of the harbor. Excellent water for ship's were freely allowed to wander about on shore for a circuit of ten miles, though at first they were watched with that suspicion which characterizes the Japanese in their treatment of foreigners. They received the unwelcome escort of squads of native soldiers, while the traders closed their shops, and husbands and fathers concealed their women at the approach of the outside barbarians.

By degrees, however, this distrust and care were abandoned. It was found that the American officers were not in the least inclined to plunder the shopkeepers, or insult the women, and the former could display their wares, and the latter their faces with impunity. Some of the girls of Simoda are very pretty, and heighten their natural attraction by the skilful use of pearl mats, are separated from each other by sliding screens that are closed or removed at pleasure. There are no chimneys in Japan. A charcoal fire is built in a little sand-pit in the middle of the floor, and the Japanese are usually found sitting on their knees drinking tea and smoking their pipes. Not a chair or any other piece of furniture can be seen. Tubs of water are kept powder and rouge, while the married ladies certainly do not improve their appearance by staining their teeth jet black.

DANCING GIRLS OF OAHU, SANDWICH ISLANDS.

An officer of the expedition writes: "The streets are wide and straight, and the better class of houses two stories high, plastered and roofed with elegant tiles. The interior is kept very clean and neat, and the rooms, covered with in front of each house, as well as on the roofs, in readiness against any fire, for conflagrations are so frequent and extensive that whole towns are sometimes burnt down. The temples chiefly Buddhist, are beautifully situated in the suburbs. The entrance to them leads generally through elegant trees and wild camelias. They are large, plain structures, with high peaked roofs, resembling the houses pictured on Chinese porcelain. In the space immediately in front is a large bell for summoning the faithful, a stone reservoir of holy water, and several roughly hewn stone idols. The doorway is ornamented with curious dragons and other animals, carved in wood. Upon entering, there is nothing special about the building worth noting, the walled sides and exposed rafters having a gloomy appearance. The altar is the only object that attracts attention. It so much resembles the Roman Catholic that I need not describe it. Some of the idols on these altars are so similar to those I have seen in the churches of Italy that if they were mutually translated I doubt whether either set of worshippers would discover the change.

MARKET SCENE AT CAPE TOWN

The priests count beads, shave their heads, and wear analogous robes, and the service is attended by the ringing of bells, the lighting of candles, and the burning of incense. In fact, except that the cross is nowhere to be seen, one could easily imagine himself within a Roman Catholic place of worship."

Such is a sketch of Simoda, where the officer who furnished us with the drawings, witnessed the funeral which forms the subject of our first picture. The body of the deceased, as he states, is placed in a neatly finished tub, surmounted by a wooden rooster. The body is in a sitting position, and the singular coffin is placed on a bier supported on the shoulders of the bearers, who wear a hat resembling an inverted willow basket. The procession is preceded by a priest chanting and beating a drum, and another reciting a prayer. Following the bier are the relatives of the deceased, dressed in a sort of nun-like costume, each being accompanied by a friend, holding a tray of fruits, confectionery, etc. The rear of the procession is brought up by friends and acquaintances.

tained the succession, he soon after announces his father's death, and the formal funeral and mourning then take place. The honors paid to deceased parents do not terminate with the mourning. Every month, on the day of the ancestor's decease, for fifty, and even for a hundred days, food, sweetmeats and fruits are set before the ifay. These funeral ceremonies are cer-

ST. AUGUSTINE'S BAY, MADAGASCAR.

In case of persons holding office, who die suddenly without having previously resigned in favor of their heirs, it is not unusual to bury them the night after their death, in a private manner; the death, though whispered about, is not officially announced. The heir, who dresses and acts as usual, notifies the authorities that his father is sick and wishes to resign. Having obtained among the most singular rites of the Japanese, and much more than we have given might be detailed respecting them.

The second engraving of our series shows the mode of conveyance generally in use, that is the palanquin, supported on the shoulders of two stalwart fellows. These vehicles are finished in a very tasteful manner, being handsomely lacquered, gilded and ornamented. In Simoda, they take the place of horses, the latter being used only under the saddle. The third engraving represents the dinner given on board the Powhatan, in honor of the commissioners appointed by the emperor to conduct negotiations. Commodore Perry invited the officers of the squadron to meet the Japanese officials, of whom there were about seventy. A very excellent dinner was served up, to which the guests did ample justice. Toasts to the emperor and president were drank with all the honors, and the company did not disperse until a very late hour.

Our next picture shows a Chinese tanka boat. The tanka boats are counted by thousands in the rivers and bays of China. They are often employed by our national vessels as conveyances to and from the shore, thereby saving the health of the sailors, who would be otherwise subjected to pulling long distances under a hot sun, with a liability of contracting some fatal disease peculiar to China, and thus introducing infection in a crowded crew.

On her voyage, the Powhatan touched at Singapore, the capital of a small island at the southern extremity of Malacca. The town stands on a point of land near a bay, affording a safe anchorage at all seasons, and commanding the navigation of the Straits of Malacca. While the Powhatan lay at anchor here, the captain permitted two jugglers to come on board to gratify the wishes of the sailors, by exhibiting their skill in legerdemain, which art they profess in a wonderful degree of perfection. The feat of swallowing a sword was performed, as exhibited in our fifth engraving. But as the weapon belonged to the juggler, the men suspected it was prepared for the purpose, and that the blade consisted of running slides, which, by the pressure of the tongue to the point, would be forced into the hilt. The Malay, however, was determined to confound the doubters, and taking up a piece of rough cast iron from the armorer's forge, swallowed it with as much ease and facility as he did the sword. The performances ended with a lively dance executed by two cobras, to the accompaniment of harsh sounds from a trumpet played by an assistant.

From Singapore let us pass to the Sandwich Islands, those gems of the Pacific. The arrival at the Sandwich Islands is always a welcome event in a cruise—the delicious climate, the abundance of fruits, the romantic scenery, the gentle manners of the inhabitants, render this portion of the globe peculiarly attractive. Our sixth engraving represents a group of Sandwich Island girls dancing the hula-hula to the intense delight of a group of Jack tars, who probably experience as much satisfaction at the exhibition, as was ever experienced by the refined Parisians at the efforts of Taglioni, Cerito, or Fanny Elssler. The hula-hula was formerly a favorite dance among the Sandwich Islands, but has now become nearly extinct through the influence of the missionaries. There are still, however, a few Kanakas, who are addicted to their old amusement. The dance does not admit of much grace, each female going through her gyrations with the mechanical stiffness of an automaton.

The next port we shall touch at, pleading the privilege of a roving commission, is Cape Town, the capital of the Cape of Good Hope, the well-known British colony at the Southern extremity of Africa. This point early attracted the attention of the Dutch, who saw that it was of the first importance as a watering-place for their ships. They accordingly established a colony there about the middle of the 17th century. They treated the native inhabitants, the Hottentots, with great severity, driving most of them beyond the mountains, and reducing the remainder to slavery. In 1795, it was captured by the English, but restored by the peace of Amiens, in 1802. In 1806, it was again captured by the English, and has remained in their possession since. It is defended by a castle of considerable strength, and contains many fine public buildings. The harbor is tolerably secure from September to May, during the prevalence of the southeast winds; but during the rest of the year, when the winds blow from the north and northwest, vessels are obliged to resort to Fulse Bay, on the other side of the peninsula.

Our seventh engraving presents a sketch of a group of marketmen at Cape Town. We here see the native fish dealers and purchasers. A young negro in the foreground is feeding a pelican with a small fish which he has purloined from the bench. The principal market of Cape Town is not very attractive externally, but it is noted for the abundance and excellence of its fish, flesh and fowl, which supply the inhabitants and the ships touching at the port. The sales are conducted much after the manner of this country. The salesmen are representatives of all quarters of the globe, and include specimens of the native Hottentot and the genuine Yankee, who is always found where money is to be made.

The eighth engraving is a view of the natives and their huts at St. Augustine's Bay, Madagascar. The inhabitants of this remarkably fertile island are composed of two distinct classes—the Arabs, or descendants of foreign colonists, and the Negroes, or original inhabitants of the island. The character of the inhabitants differs much in the different parts of the island, and the accounts of writers vary greatly on this subject. The island is off the eastern coast of Africa, separated from the continent by the Mozambique channel, and is about 900 miles long and 200 broad. Its surface is greatly diversified, and its mountain scenery is exceedingly grand. The name and position of this island was first made known to Europeans by Marco Polo, in the 13th century, though the Arabs had been acquainted with it for several centuries. It was visited by the Portuguese in the beginning of the 16th century. The French made several attempts to found colonies there in the middle of the 17th century, but abandoned them after ineffectual struggles with the natives. In 1745, they renewed their efforts with but little better success. In 1814, it was claimed by England as a dependency of Mauritius, which had been ceded to her by France, and some settlements were established. One of the native kings of the interior, who had shown himself eager to procure a knowledge of European arts for his subjects, consented, in 1820, to relinquish the slave trade on condition that ten Madagascans should be sent to England, and ten to Mauritius, for education. Those sent to England were placed under the care of the London Missionary Society, who sent missionaries and mechanics to Madagascar. In 1826, seventeen hundred children were taught in the missionary schools, and the Scriptures have since been translated into the native language.

Our last view was drawn at Bruni, in the island of Borneo, and shows the Sultan's palace. Previously to the Powhatan's joining the Japanese chored at the mouth of the principal river, and the following day a sufficient number of officers and men, in six barges, and fully armed, proceeded on their mission to Bruni, the capital, situated about thirty miles from the coast. The meeting was held at the palace of the Sultan (the house in the centre of the picture), and the negotiation was concluded in a manner satisfactory expedition, and while on her way, her duties compelled her to touch at the island of Borneo for the purpose of ratifying a treaty which was negotiated some fifteen years since, and which requires renewal every five years. Its objects are the protection and preservation of such of our men and ships as have the misfortune to be wrecked upon these shores. The steamer an-to both parties. After an exchange of presents of trifling value between our officers and the natives, and a night passed on his majesty's mats, the party embarked for the ships, the band playing the national airs, with a national salute from two howitzers. The result of such expeditions has been to make our flag known and respected in the remotest quarters of the globe.

BRUNI, ISLE OF BORNEO, SULTAN'S PALACE.

RELICS OF THE REVOLUTION.

There are few objects of more interest than mementoes of our Revolutionary days, and the actors in the scenes of that time. In accordance with this idea, we present our readers with accurate drawings of some of the relics connected with that early struggle—homely objects in themselves, but deeply interesting, nay, sacred, from association. We all know how closely identified the garment becomes with the wearer. The mantle of the dead Cæsar exhibited by Mark Antony moved his countrymen to "mutiny and rage." The gray surtout and cocked hat of a part of history, and as we gaze upon the articles he has worn, when happily they have been preserved from the ravages of time, we seem to acquire a more perfect conception of the man, imagination and memory supplying a distinct image of the form on which they have rested. Hence it is no idle or unworthy curiosity which impels us to study and to prize these relics of the past. Of the relics of Washington, depicted in this article, some are preserved in the Patent Office at Washington, and others belong to the corporation of Alexandria, Virginia, and are deposited in a room over the market house of that city. We have first the coat of Washington. It is of the old revolutionary cut, and made of blue cloth, with collar, cuffs and facings of buff, and gilt buttons. The vest and small-clothes are represented in another engraving. Following the coat are seen a chair, staff, small sword and belt which belonged to Washington. Succeeding are sketches of the bier upon which his honored remains were taken to the tomb at Mount Vernon, and the flag of his Life-guard. In another engraving are his masonic chair, regalia, and emblems. All these objects, originally of small intrinsic value, are now priceless. They are gazed upon yearly by thousands of our countrymen, and by strangers from abroad, for the fame and love of Washington belongs to the whole world. In him and through him, all humanity was dignified, and the memory of the "first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen," is cherished by the friends of freedom in the old world almost as reverentially as by the freemen of the new. If virtue be regarded as an indispensable element of greatness, as it undoubtedly should be, then our Washington stands on record as the greatest man that ever lived. Cromwell was great—Napoleon was great—in intellect unapproachable, but there are dark spots on the lustre of their reputation. Personal ambition sullied the character of these wonderful men, and darkened the close of their career. But Washington was from first to last free from the slightest taint of selfishness. Moreover, his "modesty was equal to his merit." From his lips never fell a syllable about his "mission." He never claimed to be a "man of destiny," not even when he had emerged unscathed from the rifle balls of Braddock's defeat. Love of country was his ruling passion, steadfastness of purpose the secret of his success. The victor of the enemies of his country, he was master of himself. Undazzled by the tempting offers of friend and foe, he accepted at the hands of his grateful countrymen only their authority to serve them, and he resigned that authority into the hands of his countrymen, when his term of service had expired, without a regret. History has no other record of self-denial like this. On page 518 are sketches of the flag of General Morgan's

COAT OF WASHINGTON.

Napoleon were enough of themselves to set all Paris in a ferment; the cap of Gessler was made to represent himself in the presence of the Swiss. Those artists have succeeded best and shown the most intimate knowledge of human nature, who have represented the Father of his Country "in his habit as he lived," not as a Roman consul or a Greek archon. The dress which a man has worn acquires something of his personality. Thus we recognize a friend at a distance by the air of his garments long before we can distinguish his features. The garb of a hero becomes regiment, the Richmond Rifle Rangers' flag, carried at the siege of Yorktown, a leathern camp chest and a pack-saddle. Daniel Morgan, whose flag we have here displayed, was one of the bravest soldiers of the Revolution. He was born in New Jersey in 1738. At the age of seventeen, he accompanied Braddock as a teamster in his fatal campaign against the French and Indians. For an alleged insult to a British officer, he received five hundred lashes without flinching, and an apology for the wrong done him with equal indifference. He afterwards received a commission in the provincial army, made the acquaintance of Washington, and distinguished himself by his bravery and adroitness in fighting the Indians. In 1775 he received a captaincy from Congress, and with ninety-six rifles, the germ of his famous rifle regiment, marched to Boston. He was in the van of Arnold's perilous and trying expedition to Canada in the autumn of 1775, and at the siege of Quebec, he took command when the leader was wounded. Though he fought desperately, he was made prisoner, and such was the enemy's respect for his courage, that he was offered a colonelcy in the British army, which he indignantly refused. Arnold, the American leader in that expedition, was afterwards made a brigadier general by King George, subsequent to his treason at West Point. When restored by exchange to the American lines, Morgan was made a colonel, and did good service with his regiment of riflemen. He was next promoted to a brigadier generalship and marched to the south. Here he performed his most brilliant exploit, the defeat of the British under Tarleton at the Cowpens, January 17, 1781. For that service he received the thanks of the nation by a vote of Congress, and a gold medal. He died full of years and honors, July 6, 1800. The last engraving represents two glorious trophies—the upper one a flag taken at Yorktown, at the surrender of Cornwallis, and a camp chest and flag captured from the Hessians at Trenton.

RELICS OF WASHINGTON.

Of these revolutionary relics, the articles belonging to Washington are the most valuable, and excite the greatest interest in the beholder. A great man seems to impart something of his personality to the garments he wears, and the vesture worn by the Father of his Country may well be treasured among the most sacred historical relics that time has left us. What a character was his! How completely rounded his life! How fitted at once for the age in which he lived and for all time hereafter! It is fortunate for the present generation that the tongue of America's greatest orator and the pen of America's most elegant writer are engaged in setting forth the transcendent merits and services of our national hero—"first in peace, first in war, first in the hearts of his countrymen." In other lands and in other tongues Washington is no less honored than in our own. One of the finest tributes to his greatness is that of Fontanes in his "Eloge funebre de Washington." It may not be inappropriate or uninteresting to our readers to translate it. "There are prodigious men," says the orator, "who appear at intervals on the stage of the world, with the character of animates all their thoughts; an irresistible movement is given to all their enterprises. The multitude seeks them still in its midst and finds them not; raising its eyes on high, it beholds in a sphere blazing with light and glory, him who seemed but a rash adventurer in the eyes of ignorance and envy.

WASHINGTON'S BIER—BODY GUARD FLAG.

"Such is the privilege of great characters: they seem to belong so little to modern times, that they impress, even in their lifetime, something august and antique on all they dare to execute. Their work, when scarcely finished, attracts that veneration which is willingly granted only to the works of time. The American revolution, of which we are the contemporaries, seems in fact forever established. Washington began it by energy and completed it by moderation. He knew how to maintain it by directing it always to the greatest prosperity of his country, and this end is the only one which can justify enterprises so extraordinary at the tribunal of the future. It appertains to warriors alone to mark the place which Washington will occupy among famous captains. His successes seemed to have more solidity than brilliancy, and judgment ruled more than enthusiasm in his manner of commanding and fighting. In the midst of all the disorders of camps, and all the excesses inseparable from civil war, humanity sought refuge beneath his tent and was never repulsed. In triumph and in adversity, he was always tranquil as wisdom and simple as virtue. The gentle affections remained in the depth of his heart, even at moments when the interests of his cause seemed to authorize in some sort the laws of vengeance. The movements of a magnanimous soul, let us doubt not, complete and maintain revolutions more surely than trophies and victories. The esteem obtained by the character of the American general contributed more than his arms to the independence of his country. As soon as peace was signed, he resigned to Congress all the powers with which he had been invested. He would only employ the arms of persuasion against his misled countrymen. If he had only been vulgarly ambitious, he might have overwhelmed the weakness of divided factions, and when no constitution offered a barrier to audacity, he might have grasped at power, before laws had regulated its use and limits. But these laws were solicited by himself with unyielding constancy. It was when it was impossible for ambition to usurp anything, that he accepted, by the choice of his fellow-citizens, the honor of ruling them for seven years. He had avoided authority, when its use might be arbitrary; he would not bear its burden till it had been compressed within legitimate bounds. Such a character is worthy of the noblest days of antiquity. We doubt, while combining the traits which compose it, whether it actually appeared in our century. We seem to have discovered the missing life of one grandeur and domination. An unknown and superior cause sends them, at the fitting time, to found the cradle or repair the ruins of empires. It is in vain that these fore-ordained men hold themselves aloof, or are confounded with the crowd; the hand of fortune lifts them all at once and bears them rapidly, from obstacle to obstacle, and from triumph to triumph, to the height of power. A sort of supernatural inspiration of those illustrious men whom Plutarch has painted so well. His administration was wise and firm within, noble and prudent without. He always respected the usages of other people, as he would have the rights of American people respected. Thus, in all negotiations, the heroic simplicity of the president of the United States treated with the majesty of kings, without bravado and without abasement. Do not search his administration for those thoughts which the world calls great, and which he would have deemed merely rash. His conceptions were rather wise than bold: he did not lead admiration captive, but he constantly inspired the same amount of esteem, in the camp and in the senate, in the midst of business, and in solitude. Washington had not those haughty and imposing traits which impress all minds; he displayed more order and correctness than force and elevation in his ideas. He possessed particularly, and in a superior degree, that quality which is thought vulgar, and which is so rare, that quality no less useful in the government of States than in the conduct of life, which gives more tranquillity than impetus to the soul, and more happiness than glory to those who possess it, or those who feel its effects. I speak of good sense, that good sense whose ancient laws pride has too much rejected, and which it is time to reinstate in all its rights. Audacity destroys, genius elevates, good sense preserves and perfects. Genius is entrusted with the glory of empires; but good sense alone can ensure both their repose and duration. Washington was born in an opulence which he had nobly increased, like the heroes of ancient Rome, in the midst of agricultural labors. Although he was the enemy of vain splendor, he wished republican manners to be encircled with some dignity. None of his compatriots loved liberty more warmly; no one more feared the exaggerated opinions of certain demagogues. His mind, the friend of order, constantly avoided all excesses. He dared not insult the experience of ages; he did not wish to change everything, or destroy everything at once; he maintained in this respect the doctrine of the ancient legislators. Like them, Washington governed by the sentiments and the affections more than by orders and laws; like them, he was simple in respect to honors; like them, he remained great in the midst of retirement. He had only accepted power to strengthen the public prosperity; he did not wish it bestowed on him when he saw that America was happy and had no further need of his devotion. He wished, like the other citizens, tranquillity to enjoy the happiness that a great people had received through him. But it was in vain that he abandoned the highest place; the greatest name in America was still Washington's. Four years had hardly elapsed since he had retired from the administration. This man, who for a long time had led armies, who was the chief of thirteen States, lived without ambition, in the calm of the fields, in the midst of the vast domain he cultivated, surrounded by flocks which his care had increased in the solitude of the new world. He marked the close of his life by all the domestic and patriarchal virtues, after having illustrated it by all the political and military virtues. America looked respectfully towards the retreat inhabited by her defender; and from this retreat, comprising so much glory, often issued wise counsels, which had no less force than in the days of his authority; his fellow-citizens hoped long to hear him, but death suddenly carried him off in the midst of occupations the sweetest and most worthy of old age."

DRESS OF WASHINGTON.

FLAG OF MORGAN'S REGIMENT—RICHMOND RIFLE RANGERS
CAMP CHEST—PACK SADDLE.

Such is the portrait of our beloved Washington traced by the hand of a distinguished foreigner, who shows remarkable aptitude in seizing on his prominent traits. The death of Washington fell like a thunderbolt on the country. So short was his illness that, at the seat of government, the intelligence of his death preceded that of his indisposition. It was first communicated by a passenger in the stage to an acquaintance whom he met in the street, and the report quickly reached the House of Representatives, which was then in session. A solemn silence prevailed for several minutes. Judge Marshall, then a member of the house, stated in his place the melancholy information which had been received. The information, he said, was not certain, but there was too much reason to believe it true. "After receiving intelligence," he said, "of a national calamity so heavy and afflicting, the house of representatives can be but ill fitted for public business." He therefore moved an adjournment, and the house adjourned. The funeral took place on Wednesday, December 16, 1799. "It matters very little," says Phillips, "what immediate spot may have been the birthplace of such a man as Washington. No people can claim, no country can appropriate him. The boon of Providence to the human race, his fame is eternity, and his residence creation. Though it was the defeat of our arms, and the disgrace of our policy, I almost bless the convulsion in which he had his origin. If the heavens thundered, and the earth rocked, yet, when the storm had passed, how pure was the element that it cleared!

WASHINGTON'S MASONIC CHAIR—INSIGNIA OF OFFICE.

how bright, in the brow of the firmament, was the planet it revealed to us! In the production of Washington, it does really appear as if Nature was endeavoring to improve upon herself, and that all the virtues of the ancient world were but so many studies preparatory to the patriot of the new." We have said that as time rolls on, it does but deepen and intensify the fame of Washington. The slightest memorials of this great man are sought for with the utmost anxiety. The very few remaining on the stage of life who saw him face to face, have something of reflected glory in the eyes of his countrymen, and the movement now approaching consummation, inaugurated by the ladies of America, to secure Mount Vernon as a sacred shrine forever, testifies to the veneration entertained for his fame. But his best eulogy, the truest gratitude that can be shown the Father of his Country, is for us to imitate his virtues and to adhere to the great political principles laid down by him for his guidance and ours.

FLAG TAKEN AT YORKTOWN—FLAG TAKEN FROM THE HES-SIANS—CAMP CHEST.

ALONE.

BY FRANK PORTESQUE.

Shivering, ragged, sick, alone,
 Sat a maiden on a stone;
 While above her sounds the bell
 That doth tell her—O how well!
 The midnight hour.

Fast and faster falls the snow;
 Hard and harder winds do blow;
 White and whiter grows her form;
 Even her rags are from her torn
 By the storm.

Still she sat, and to the gale
 Told her oft-repeated tale:
 Want of shelter, want of bread,
 Frozen limbs, uncovered head;
 O, how cold!

Cold as north wind is man's heart,
 In sympathy not far apart.
 Who will hear her—who befriend?
 Who the needed succor send?
 Look above.

From that body, earth forsaken,
 Weary spirit God has taken;
 Frozen lips will move no more
 Man's cold charity implore
 Never more.

THE YOUNG BARRISTER.

A STORY OF THE LAST CENTURY.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

CHAPTER I.

THE BOSTON MASSACRE.

"DID you hear Sam Adams yesterday at Faneuil Hall?" inquired an athletic, good-humored looking youth, of one who sat opposite to him at a little round table in Madam Guignon's coffee-room—a place no less noted among the Boston coffee-takers of a former century, than is the celebrated Mrs. Haven's at the present day.

"No, Henry," answered the other, who bore a strong likeness to the first speaker, though younger and more delicate looking; "I was detained by an accident which happened to me as I was riding over the Neck. I had been out to Roxbury, and on my return had got a little way past Farnham's shops, when a mischievous urchin took it into his head to fling a pebble at my horse. The animal shying violently, threw me head foremost to the ground, so that I was stunned. When I came to, I found myself in the house opposite where the accident had taken place. The boy-scamp, who was the first cause of the trouble, and who, as I discovered, belonged to the family, stood at the door blubbering most pathetically, no doubt in anticipation of the punishment which awaited him as soon as he could be properly attended to. But Harry, on my honor, I can't regret my absence from the oration, much less my head thumping, since it introduced me to the sight of such a glorious creature as Anna Graham."

"Eh!" exclaimed Henry, glancing up from the coarse page of the Gazette which he had been carelessly perusing. "You don't mean to say that you have, in this romantic fashion, acquired the acquaintance of that peerless belle, Anna Graham? Really, it is hardly fair of you to steal a march on your elder brother in that sort of way. Here have I, during the last two or three weeks, been pushing my approaches as boldly as I dared, at parties and otherwise, and all at once you, with the help of a just breeched boy and a restive horse, have got up a scene which I really fear has brought you a long way ahead of me, in spite of the start which I had obtained. It is too bad—altogether too bad, Willie."

"Don't complain of me, Harry," replied his brother, smiling. "I assure you that there has been no contrivance on my part. And now that the war has begun, let it be to the knife. You know that no quarter can be expected on either side, when fighting the battles of Cupid."

"Even so," rejoined Henry. And his attention again reverted to the Gazette.

Perceiving his brother, as he supposed, busily studying its columns, Willis More mentioned an engagement which required his presence, and accordingly took his leave. The Anna Graham, who had been mentioned in the foregoing colloquy, was an orphan, of Scottish derivation on her father's side, her mother having been an Englishwoman bred in London. Some time after the death of the last-mentioned parent, Anna had received an invitation from a wealthy uncle, on this side of the Atlantic, to make her permanent abode with him. As a mere child, she had been much attached to him, and, though now scarce sixteen, had eagerly accepted the offer, under guardianship of the captain of the good brig Hesper, which arrived at Boston about three months previous to the opening of our story.

Henry and Willis More became attracted to her by a certain similarity of circumstance (for they also had been deprived of their parents years since), as well as by her personal beauty and by the grace of her manners. Like insensibly attracts like, and though surrounded by the homage of the wealthy and the titled, a close intimacy ripened between Anna and the two young students at law.

In one respect, these young men had the advantage over many of Miss Graham's hangers-on. They had the piquancy which a patriotic enthusiasm could confer. The times were full of excitement. Friends and families had become divided against each other on the merits of the question which had arisen. Anna's uncle, Alexander Graham, was one of those who remained inactive when it was in their power so to remain. He had great possessions, and was afraid to commit them to the waves of civil conflict. But his sympathies tended toward the popular side—so much so, at all events, that Anna soon became touched with the current feeling of the citizens. Her red-coated admirers were wont to term her the "Fair Rebel," and sportively to deprecate her arming herself against them, which jesting the maiden pretty freely repaid.

But the Mores were unable to treat the subject with levity, and the imprudent conduct of Henry caused a quarrel between the brothers and some of Graham's guests. The host, considering the rights of hospitality to have been invaded by the young Americans, took part against them in such wise that they were left no alternative but to cease their visits to the family.

Henry complained bitterly of the treatment which he had received, and even inveighed against Anna as being a friend to tyranny.

"I'll not hear you speak thus unjustly of her," cried Willis. "She is a noble girl—too good for either you or I to speak idly of. Were you any other than my brother, I would do battle with you at once on the matter."

"Willie!" replied the other, facing him whom he addressed with a grave and earnest look. "Tell me truly—are you not in love with Anna Graham?"

There was no dissembling of countenance on either side; and after a momentary silence, the younger averted his face, only saying:

"Harry, I fear it is so."

Not a word more was said on that score; but from that moment, they knew each other as rivals—brotherly ones, it was true, but rivals nevertheless. A few minutes afterward, Henry placed in the hands of Willis a slip of paper, with the following explanation:

"Willie, our old master Bedloe offers to us the office adjoining his own; and on easy terms, the half of his practice. There, on that paper, is a rough average of the amount of that particular department referred to, during the two last years. What think you of the offer?"

"Of course I can have but one answer—accept it."

"Town boys, turn out! Turn out all!" cried a voice in the street below.

"Another fracas between our citizens and the English troops," exclaimed Harry. "I had hoped these brawls would cease for the present. I fear that our people sometimes give offence, as well as take it."

He had deemed the alarm but momentary. In this, however, he was much deceived; for, after an instant of silence, there came the sound of increasing tumult, parties of men hurrying past with noisy execrations, and then the crash of musketry rang out sharp and clear.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed the brothers, starting up in unison! "there is something here of real import."

They rushed down stairs; and as they reached the street, the bells of the town rang out the prelude of the coming Revolution. We will not enter into needless details of a scene so universally familiar. That day was enacted the Boston Massacre. In two hours the town was in arms, and a civil war seemed ready to open on the spot. Governor Hutchinson was obliged to remove his troops from the town limits. Captain Preston and his company, the chief offenders in the scene of violence, were arrested on charge of murder, to be tried before the civil authorities. By these, and similar concessions, the indignation of the citizens was quieted; and they rested in anticipation of a speedy punishment of the imprisoned offenders.

It was no later than the following afternoon, when the two brothers found themselves already installed in their new office. While busied with their arrangements, they were disturbed by a gentle tap at the door.

"Come in!" said the elder brother, hastily.

The door opened, and a female, closely veiled, stood before them. The veil was drawn aside, and Anna Graham stood revealed to view. She blushed deeply at the surprise visible in the countenances of the young men, and said to Harry, at the same time refusing the chair which the latter offered:

"Master More, I trust that an errand of life or death may excuse my boldness in coming hither. And, indeed, I have had no little difficulty in searching you out. I may have misjudged," she continued, with some embarrassment, "but I have imagined that my intercession might be of avail in the matter which I have to disclose. Lieutenant Somers, brother of a young friend of mine, and an officer in Captain Preston's company, is imprisoned with his commander on accusation of murder. Without doubt, you will recollect meeting the lieutenant at my father's house. His sister, a dear friend of mine, is wholly overcome by her fears on his account, and indeed my father declares that the lieutenant stands in much peril, in case he be not properly defended. Maria Somers, then, has entreated me to persuade you to plead in his defence. She seems to have fixed on you especially. Will you accede to her wishes on his behalf?"

"And more especially to your own wishes for his welfare?" replied Harry, with a sudden and penetrating glance at his fair visitor.

The latter colored to the temples, then recovering herself, threw back a look of haughty disdain.

"Methinks, sir, you scarce need question me so particularly. Am I to understand that you refuse the request?"

"No, not so," replied Harry, hastily. "I pray you be seated. Since you desire it, I will undertake Lieutenant Somers's defence; or, at least, I will promise to serve him in such way as may appear most advantageous to his welfare."

"I thank you," answered the lady, her eyes brightening with gratitude, "not merely for myself, but most especially for my friend Maria, whose welfare is, I may inform you, more particularly affected in this case than mine own. And now, as I am about to bid you adieu, I may add to the liberty which I have already taken, that of reproving yourself and your brother for your long-continued absence from our mansion. I trust that we have endeavored, in past time, to be fairly hospitable; and both my father and myself would hope that differences in opinion should not be considered a sufficient cause for thus absenting yourselves. I need say no more. Farewell, sir, with many thanks."

As she disappeared, Harry, turning back, threw himself into his comfortable leathern-bound chair, and gave himself up to a fit of musing. From this he was aroused by overhearing a faint sigh from his brother. Starting from his seat, he went to the latter and grasped him by the hand.

"She is a glorious girl, is she not, Willis? But sooner than she should create a spirit of contention between us, I would henceforth and forever abjure all hope of her regard. Willie, it is hard to say it—but, if fortune offer you opportunity to gain her, push your chance to the utmost; win her and wear her for your own."

"No, Harry," replied the other, returning the fond grasp, and glancing up with an affectionate look. "It would be useless for me to attempt such a thing. My eyes cannot be blind, even though I might wish them so. You may not perceive it, but I see clearly that Anna Graham loves you. You need not feign incredulity; it is as I say."

"I would not feign an incredulity which I did not feel," rejoined the elder. "But, Willie, you are too ready, I think, to pronounce in my favor. Let it all pass, though, for the time being. Whatever may be, Willie, let us never forget that we must ever remain brothers in heart and deed. Thus have we always been; thus are we always to be."

"Yes, with all my soul!" And the tears trickled down the cheek of the younger. "The promise we made to our dying mother shall never be broken, please Heaven!"

"And now to business," continued Harry. "I will own that a momentary jealousy came over me, through suspicion of Miss Graham's special interest in the lieutenant. He is a fine-looking fellow, indeed, and might warrant by his appearance much misgiving on my part. However, I am not going to think of that now. How it will fare with his defence, I know not. The feeling against Captain Preston and his officers is very strong, and we know that the feeling of a community cannot but affect, in some degree, the action of its judicial court. I have not attempted to examine the particulars of the case, but there is a rumor about, that Sam Adams has expressed himself against the infliction of a severe penalty on the prisoners. If he could be induced to act on their defence, a great advantage would be gained on their part."

Willis shook his head. "He could scarcely be induced to take the part of the soldiers against the people. The sympathies of Sam Adams are too strongly whig to allow that."

"Ay," replied Harry, emphatically. "But strong as his sympathies are, he will not suffer them to outride his sense of justice. And, notwithstanding the confusion of various accounts, I do think that the blame was not altogether on the side of the soldiery. Let justice be done. I believe that I can honestly stand in defence of Lieutenant Somers, and I shall do so, whatever may happen."

"You are right, as ever," exclaimed Willis. "Certainly, I had no wish to move you from your intention. On the contrary, I would cheerfully offer my assistance, if the assistance can be of any value. How say you?"

"We shall soon be able to settle that. You know the motto we have chosen, 'United!' We never yet had disagreed in its application."

CHAPTER II.

THE WAR PRISONS OF NEW YORK IN '76.

"O, MARIA, I can scarce support the thought even of the prison which he, which they, are enduring. You will not think me too selfish, dear friend, that I have him first in mind. No, not even while you yourself feel the pangs of a like sorrow with myself—like, but not equal, for O, it is my husband whom I mourn as one dead. Bear with my agony, Maria. It is a terrible presentiment that tortures me. O that I could stifle the thought!"

"Be yourself, Anna!" murmured Maria Somers, gently pillowing Anna's aching head on her own bosom. "Charles will do all that can be done, as you well know. We will hope that these sad forebodings will soon be dispelled. Is it not superstitious thus to give way to our imaginations? Come, then, take courage."

"Alas, poor maid," exclaimed Anna, raising her head and clasping her friend in her arms, "it is vain for you to dissimulate with that little heart of yours trembling and fluttering like a dove in your bosom! Poor heart, which loves him so dearly! Ah, he shall be yours, if he but live! I will assume to be prophetess of your future, and will stake my truth on your fate foretold. Willis shall be yours!"

Maria, paling and crimsoning, disengaged the arms of her friend; but the latter, clasping her the more closely, rained kisses on the cheek and lips of the maiden.

"Nay, it is useless for you to struggle; and you must own that I am the stronger. Now listen! for I am about to recite a passage from memory, while I hold you captive. Do you remember then, little one, that once on a time a certain Lieutenant Somers was on trial for his life, with the whole country clamoring for his blood? Then a Harry More, my Harry, stood up boldly in the front, with a Willis More at his side, and fought manfully for your dear brother, cheered only by the eagle-eyed Adams, and one or two noble spirits, against the revengeful rage of thousands who denounced them openly as traitors to that cause of liberty which they had undertaken to forward. So they fought and conquered. And then this audacious Harry More refused to be rewarded for his services by any other than me who had engaged them. You know how I was obliged to reward him. But Willis, Harry's Willie, goes yet unrecompensed. Yet Maria knows it is not always so to be."

"I know nothing of the kind," exclaimed Maria, indignantly freeing herself from her friend. "Your words sting me to the heart, Anna; that heart which I cannot prevent you from reading—ah, so much more truly than I would! You know that he loves me not; scarce has a thought of me. How, then, can you—how dare you thus torture me?"

"I torture you, Maria?" replied the other, sadly. "Indeed, I meant it not."

"Hallo, young ladies!" said a voice at the door; "I am endeavoring not to overhear you, but I shall be forced to do so, unless you choose to let me in."

"It is Charles!" exclaimed Maria, as half laughing, half vexed, she hastened to open the door.

"What news?" anxiously inquired Anna, as Charles Somers entered.

"Nothing of importance," was the answer. "I think, however, that their place of confinement will soon be known to me; and I am going, this afternoon, to ascertain if my conjectures are correct. There, my dear girls, do not question me now. Be patient, and hope for the best."

"The best!" said Anna. "Ah, if the result could make the saying true!"

From the lodgings of his sister and her friend, Captain Somers (such was now his title) took his way to the new jail, or Provost. For several days, Somers had prosecuted his inquiries in the New York prisons of war without success. Finally, however, he had fixed on the Provost as that one of the city prisons most likely to contain the objects of his search. Gaining entrance at the main door, he inquired for Captain Cunningham's quarters, whither he was accordingly directed. There, in answer to his announcement of himself, a coarse featured man stood before him, clad in half uniform. Captain Somers having stated his errand, the prison lists were placed before him.

"I have such a squad of these rebels on my hands, and they have given me such cursed trouble, that we haven't always kept the list perfectly straight. But it doesn't make much difference, you know, a few odd rebels in the lump."

Making no reply, Somers continued his examination of the ill-written columns.

"I do not find their names here," he said at length, "unless this be intended for one of them."

Cunningham looked over the shoulder of the visitor at the spot where the finger of the latter was placed. It discovered, couched in scrawling, scarce legible letters, this inscription:

"Garry Moor; Number 10."

Cunningham burst into a loud laugh.

"That must be Jack Niggs's writing," he cried; "and he was certainly drunk when he made it, for he can do a little better when he is sober. As for the rest, I dare say these pot-hooks are meant for that devil's imp you are looking for; and like enough, the other may be with him. But come along! I'll root them out, if they are here."

Not a little disgusted at the bearing of the keeper, as he strode on before him swearing, hiccuping, and rattling his massive keys, Somers was led down a flight of stairs to a low door crossed and re crossed by iron bands. A sentinel who had followed a little way behind, remained outside of the threshold while Cunningham forced an entrance. Surprised at the crowd within, and overcome by the foul fumes which escaped from the apartment, Somers hesitated for a second.

"Come in, man! come in!" ejaculated the keeper's brutal voice. "Don't be abashed before this noble company of persons, lawyers, doctors, pimps, infernal rebels and horse-thieves. Look you! in what a pretty pickle they keep themselves!"

"You beastly villain!" said a haggard but strong-limbed man, stepping in front of Cunningham. "Are not starvation, poison, and outright murder, enough for us? Must you come to us here, among our dying fellows, with your slanderous bellowing? Another word of this from your lips, and I'll choke you on the spot!"

Half intoxicated though he was, Cunningham shrunk away pale and cringing. No interference was offered either from the sentinel outside, or from Captain Somers within. The latter had not even noticed the altercation, so absorbed was he in the condition of the wretched men around him. At the opposite part of the room, underneath a narrow slit in the wall which served as a window, he observed a little group gathered about a prostrate and emaciated form. Pressing his way towards the spot, he stood over the dying prisoner. A man, scarce more life-like, was supporting the victim's head and talking with him in low and endearing tones. Somers bent over to catch the words.

"Willie," said the dying voice, "you have indeed been to me a loving brother. If you live, I need not ask you to remember and care for her."

Somers had like to have fallen with the shock. He sank down on his knees by Harry's side. But it was already over. Something between a sob and a groan escaped from the breast of Somers, and a few manly tears came to relieve, in a measure, his overburdened spirit. He turned to Willis; but the eyes of the latter were glazed and indifferent. The brother saw nothing, thought of nothing, but the dead.

"One more dead man's ration for Cunningham to draw," said a bystander, turning away,

"Queer arithmetic yours!" said another, with a dismal mirth. "You know that not one of us has had a half ration for two months past. But half a ration of such stuff is about as good as the whole."

At these words, thus carelessly uttered, Somers glanced rapidly around, penetrating in some degree the horrors of the prison's history. With blood at boiling heat, he approached Cunningham, who stood stupidly gazing on the corpse, and seized him with a vicelike grasp.

"Mean, detestable villain!" he cried, or rather hissed in his ear. "Can you look on your work coolly, and without shuddering?"

"Let go my arm!" replied the keeper, with a hoarse growl. "For yonder piece of carrion, take it away; or leave it, if you wish. I care not. I'll not fash myself over a dead rebel. Will you let go, sir? Ho there, sentinel!"

Somers gave way to prudence. He drew back just in time to prevent the spark from lighting into action the revengeful beings who hovered around him. Willis came to him, and laid his bony hands on his friend's shoulders.

"Let him alone!" he said. "I would not have his life touched now, if I could. I have sworn to live till I see him at the gallows with a halter round his neck. Do what you can for us, Somers. Get poor Harry's body a Christian burial. But for our sake, and for your own, don't soil your fingers by touching yonder reptile."

"You are right," returned Somers. "Your requests shall be fulfilled. And you, sir," he continued to Cunningham, "scarcely deserving the name of man, take care that these objects of your cursed inhumanity and neglect are treated henceforth with becoming decency. Not here, merely, but throughout the prison. If you fail so to do, I can assure you that it will be the worse for your welfare. I will see that the body is removed for proper burial as soon as possible. Willis, I trust that I am not too sanguine in giving you hope of speedy release from this den of suffering."

CHAPTER III.

THE DISCOVERY.

"I AM pleased in being able to inform you, madam, that there is every probability of the suit terminating favorably to our wishes. Indeed, I am warranted in assuring you that the enormous property which has been in litigation, will soon come in possession of Major Somers and his sister. At the least computation, fifty thousand pounds will fall to the lady. And I trust that she will allow me to congratulate her on her being able to receive the news of her good fortune with so much composure."

Miss Somers smiled, and thanked the speaker for the compliment which he had conveyed to her. Anna, pale and clad in deep mourning, yet looking even more lovely than of old, glanced affectionately at her fair companion, and then, turning to the skilful lawyer who sat opposite them, she said :

"Sir James, I must also add my thanks for your earnest labors. Indeed, I am not certain but that I appreciate the prize of fortune much more vividly than does my good Maria, whose thoughts seem scarcely able to attach value to this omnipotent gold. But the devotion which you have shown in her cause, she does most fully appreciate ; no one can feel it more deeply. But (I am almost ashamed to express my doubts after what you have just said) are you indeed so confident with regard to the inability of the enemy to continue the contest which they have hitherto maintained in so determined a manner ? Will they not resort to still further trickery, before yielding a prize so enormous ?"

The lawyer smiled—his eye keen and glittering, his lips for an instant vigorously compressed.

"I will not deny that your suggestion is a sagacious one," he presently replied. "I do not doubt that they will continue to attempt, as they have heretofore, every species of craft which may serve to uphold their failing cause. But it will go hard, if the few possible defences remaining to them be able long to withstand the batteries which we have brought to bear. I repeat it, then, I think the battle is nearly done. And now, ladies," he continued, wheeling his chair a little nearer, "I have something to relate which may be of interest, as bordering, in some degree, on that romance in which your sex so much delights—"

"In which we but copy you lawyers," interrupted Anna, with laughing eyes. "Were we to judge from certain specimens of high-flown diction which have been uttered, at various times, by gentlemen of your so-called unimaginative profession."

"I stand corrected," said Sir James, with a deprecating bow. "And now I will go on with my story. There has been lately under my eyes, or I should say, with more exactness, under the observance of my subordinates, a certain man about town, for whom it would be useless to claim the merit of decent looks or decent manners. I have seen him but once or twice ; and there is a repulsiveness in his appearance which I would scarce care to express. That man has led a life of violence, if I am able to read physiognomy rightly. He is connected, indirectly, with the case of the opposite party ; only, however, as witness about some trifling circumstance which is not worth mentioning here. Nevertheless I make it a rule, in an affair like this, to keep a strict lookout even on the most remote operations of the enemy. As I said before, the man has the look and bearing of a criminal. Yet nothing that I know declares him to be actually such.

"Benson, as he calls himself, has been in the habit of frequenting an obscure gambling-house, where of late he has several times fallen in with a young man of whom I know nothing, save that he is reported to have a very strange and haggard countenance, and a look which might be suspected to bespeak insanity, did not the peculiarities of his conduct rather oppose the idea. Benson and this man had played against each other during two or three evenings, and the former had almost invariably lost. On the last evening, Benson suffered so severely that he lost temper, and threw out some insinuations against his antagonist. The latter retorted instantly with a violent blow in the face. A challenge was the consequence. A meeting took place yesterday morn, and the young man was conveyed to his lodgings—and miserable ones they were—with a ball through the left arm, shattering the bone. A medical friend of mine happened to be called to the case. I understand that the wounded man is an American by birth, and, it would seem, from some incoherent scraps of talk, was for some time a prisoner of war to our people in New York, during the late struggle. His feverish ravings show that he must have been severely treated ; and he speaks of a brother who died in the prison, and whose death he has devoted himself to revenge. But ladies—Miss Somers, what have I said ?"

Maria grew very pale, and her friend sprang to uphold her in her arms. Maria leaned her head on the shoulder of her fair supporter, saying, in a low voice :

"It is he ! it is he !"

"Impossible !" exclaimed Anna, in a voice whose agitation belied the assurance she affected. "It is now little more than a month since Willis wrote me that he meditated a voyage to the West Indies, for the restoration of his health. Most improbable it is, that he can be here. But, after all, it is better that we should at once know the truth concerning the matter. If you, or some other friend, Sir James, will be our escort, we will visit the poor fellow. It will not be amiss, at all events, since he must need many little comforts which we can convey him."

A carriage was summoned, and the ladies set forth, accompanied by Sir James, who directed the coachman to drive to an obscure street in the neighborhood of Newgate Prison. After some little delay, they succeeded in reaching the designated locality—a street so puny and dilapidated, that its name had scarce ever reached the ear of the driver of the hack. Leaving the ladies in the carriage, Sir James entered the house, from whence he emerged after a short absence, telling his companions that he had found the apartment of the wounded man, and that he was ready, if they chose, to conduct them thither.

"It is a wretched sort of a place at the best," he said; "yet not quite so squalid as one might have guessed, from the neighborhood it is in. Move carefully up these stairs, ladies! You will perceive that they are rotting with age and damp. Yet it may be that these decrepid habitations have been, in the old times, the habitations of comfort and even of wealth."

Ascending four or five rickety flights, they came to a landing-place, turning off from which, Sir James opened a door leading into a narrow, low-walled room, in one corner of which, on a cot bed, lay the object of their search. They approached him; but Maria, at first sight of his face, clutched her friend Anna by the arm, and, pointing to the emaciated sleeper, exclaimed:

"It is as I thought—yet O, how changed!"

"Changed indeed!" said Anna, with a mournful voice. "Poor Willis! I scarce should have known him. I fear that his days are numbered."

Though spoken in a low tone, the words fell with a perverted significance on the dreamer's brain.

"No, vile Cunningham," he said, "I shall not die, till I have most fully avenged my brother's murder on your detestable existence. No, come what will in the meantime, you shall not escape my vengeance."

His hearers turned on each other an astonished look.

"What can this mean?" inquired Sir James.

"Can it be possible," said Anna, musingly, "that this antagonist, against whom Willis has ventured his life, is Cunningham himself, under a disguised name? What shall be done? Ought we to interrupt his slumber?"

"It is not for me to advise," replied Sir James.

"But it is possible that you may soon have your question resolved, since I hear a footstep on the stairs which much resembles that of my friend the doctor."

His conjecture was speedily verified by the appearance of this latter personage at the door. Pausing for a moment in surprise at sight of these unexpected visitors, he advanced with a courteous inclination of the head.

"I am rejoiced, ladies, to find you here," he said, after he had been specially introduced by Sir James. "My patient stands sadly in need of some closer looking after than I am able to give him. Medicine may do much, but by no means the greater part, towards his recovery. A competent nurse should be had, if possible."

"He will scarce want for that, now," replied Anna, "since he is my husband's brother."

"You surprise me," rejoined the physician. "I will only say that he is truly fortunate in having such a claim upon you. With such care and attention as you will give, I think he may recover. Excitement, however, must be guarded against. There would seem to be certain matters preying on his mind, and exerting an influence unfavorable to his progress. Your own judgment will prompt you sufficiently in following out my suggestions."

"Will it be possible to remove him from this place at once?" inquired Anna.

The doctor shook his head.

"I would not risk it now," he answered. "In a day or two it may be done. In the meantime, I think it may be easily managed so that he will have all necessary care."

CHAPTER IV.

THE FATE OF PROVOST CUNNINGHAM.

"Can this be the Provost Cunningham, of the New York prison notoriety?"

"The very same. Now convicted of executing a forged will produced in the recent case of Somers versus Somers. That affair you recollect, where there was more than half a million sterling at stake. But hush! Sentence is about to be pronounced."

The scarce sensible movement which had agitated the crowded tenants of the court-room had died away in utter silence. The judge turned his eyes from the jury to the prisoner.

"Peter Cunningham, if you have aught to say why the punishment of death should not be passed upon you, you now have permission to speak."

The prisoner started to his feet, and, grasping the rail, gazed about him with a glazed eye.

"My lord," he said, with a hoarse, half stifled utterance, "I am a murdered man. My life has been sworn away by an enemy. My lord, I had the honor of serving his majesty in the late American war. I was appointed keeper of one of the military prisons in New York, and, among the rebels there confined was Willis More, the man who has had the greatest part in producing my conviction. And now, I recollect, this has already been spoken of. Yes, my lord, this designing villain vowed vengeance against me on account of my faithful performance of duty, and he has dogged me until he has accomplished his purpose. My lord, I throw myself on the mercy of the king, whom I have served, and who, I trust, will not see the life of an old servant destroyed by foul perjury."

Cunningham sunk back nerveless into his seat, and there was a faint murmur of sympathy throughout the audience. More sat at no great distance from the bar, pale but composed. The judges conferred together for a few moments, when the chief justice arose, and, putting on the ominous cap, summoned the prisoner once more. Again the command was obeyed, mechanically, and as it seemed to many, without the consciousness of volition.

"Your appeal, wretched man," his lordship said, in commencing, "will be duly referred to those who alone can have cognizance over it. It only remains to me to pronounce the sentence which now becomes due by the proper course of law. And, deeply feeling as I do the misery of your situation, I would not expose you to greater suffering by giving you any hope of reprieve or pardon. The circumstances of your past life are, in some degree, known to us. To your conscience I leave the decision, whether you have, throughout your military life, shown yourself a truly honest servant to the king whose interposition you now implore; and whether you are clear from the guilt of having perverted his majesty's offices to the purposes of your avarice and cruelty. But I will forbear to add unnecessarily to the bitterness of your thoughts. Be sure that the mercy of the king has not left, and will not leave unconsidered, any extenuating circumstance which might plead in mitigation of your crime. Yet I must repeat that I cannot (and ought not) give you any hope of such a mitigation. Of the charge which you have made against one of the witnesses in this trial, I would remind you that his position and his testimony have been subjected to a thorough investigation, and his personal bias duly considered in your behalf. I must say to you, that your plea of conspiracy on his part has not the slightest foundation."

The speaker continued in a clear and solemn voice, admonishing the prisoner to make due repentance and a proper preparation for the end of life. His words, however, fell dull and unmeaningly on Cunningham's ears. Around the latter, all sounds and forms floated confused and shapeless. But soon the knell of the fatal words "until you are dead, dead, dead!" pierced his brain with a thrill of agony, and he fell backward, motionless and senseless as the clod of which he was, ere long, to be the equal.

The trial was concluded; and the assemblage, for the most part dispersed to the various avocations of city life. More passed homeward to the comfortable mansion of his sister-in-law. Meeting her in the drawing-room, he was obliged to answer her questions concerning the scene in which he had been an actor. Despite his efforts, a dejection pressed on his spirits, which was but aggravated by his recalling to mind the incidents of the trial. At length he abruptly exclaimed:

"Anna, I would really wish to forget that I had had anything to do with this wretched business. I cannot help a feeling of guilt attaching to my connection with it; as though I had been in some degree a murderer at heart, chasing this poor wretch to the gallows, to satisfy the revengeful thirst which devoured my heart. Yet I have struggled against this passion; I even thought that I had conquered it. Had it not been for you, for Maria, and for my more than brother, Captain Somers, I should not have been able to control this madness of mind. Nay, I should not have lived to battle it. And even now, a certain remorse pursues me. Has not revenge, rather than justice, been my aim? I cannot answer the question satisfactorily to myself."

"A little self-examination may do you no harm," replied the other, "yet you should not give way to undue self-reproach. You have suffered much in the past, Willis, and in consideration of this there should be something to be forgiven in your errors of heart. And for what has happened of late, I certainly do not think you have occasion to reproach yourself. You undertook to aid the attorneys engaged in the interests of our friends, without knowing at the time that Cunningham was in any way involved with this affair. On finding him criminally engaged against them, was it not your duty to ferret out the forgery which he had perpetrated? And would you not have done the same, had another individual been in his place?"

"Most probably. I think it must be the sight of the man's utter despair, which has so touched me. I cannot believe that the ruling motive of my action, during the last two months, has been a thirst for his life. Even now, I would most willingly abate his doom, if so it could be. The crime of forgery ought not, in my conviction, to be punished so severely."

"I have often thought as much. Yet Sir James declares this severity to be absolutely necessary. He asserts the temptation held out to unprincipled skill to be so great, that society would not be safe without the infliction of the death penalty."

"His doctrine may admit of some doubt. By the way, it is singular that Cunningham should have had the ingenuity to execute so plausible a forgery as this false will of the late Lord Somers. And it is still more singular, that the persons whom it was intended to benefit, should have contrived to preserve themselves from the ruin which has overwhelmed their subordinate. They wove a cunning web of chicanery in the course of the property suit. Sir James, and the other lawyers who contended for our friends, had like to have been baulked, and it was a narrow chance by which the case was gained."

"You wrong yourself and others, in thus speaking," exclaimed a soft voice behind him.

"Ah, Miss Somers—ah, Maria—is it you?" exclaimed Willis and Anna, speaking together. "You have stolen a march upon us."

Maria continued, with sparkling eyes:

"It is to the constant vigilance of our friends, not to blind chance, that we owe our good fortune; and I trust that we shall not be so ungrateful, nor these friends so unkind, as to forget that benefits should be mutual, in order to be really useful or pleasurable."

Willis regarded her with a puzzled air.

"I do not fully understand the meaning that you would convey," he said.

"I meant nothing," she hastened to reply, with the embarrassment of one who had spoken prematurely; "at least—"

"Allow me to finish," exclaimed Anna, smiling. "Brother Willis, this young lady and her brother have made over to you ten thousand pounds of the property to which they have become entitled. The secret might as well come to light now, as at any other time."

Willis was for a moment thunderstruck; and, judging by his face, the emotions aroused by the intelligence were not altogether of a pleasing nature.

"I did not labor for money," he said at last, with a cold demeanor.

Anna stared in his face with surprise; but presently, with a mischievous glance at her fair companion:

"Neither for love nor money, Willis?"

"You are pleased to jest, Anna," he replied, still with the same constrained manner. "I must repeat; I have no occasion for the money. Decidedly, I cannot accept it, or any part of it."

Maria moved toward the window to conceal the wound inflicted by this ungracious reply.

"You are a singular being, Willis," exclaimed the offended Anna. "I do not comprehend your ways, nor the reasons of them. Of course, it is not for me to inquire further. Your position and fortune, without doubt, place you altogether beyond reach of friendly offices."

"I understand you," said Willis, slowly. "I perceive it is necessary for me to explain. I have accepted a mercantile agency, which will oblige me to set out, next week, for South America. The salary which I am to draw will be amply sufficient for my residence there."

A stifled cry caused him to look up.

"She has fainted!" exclaimed Anna, darting at him a glance of indignation. "How dare you, sir, trifle with her feelings in such a fashion?"

He was already by her side, and much more agitated than herself.

"Miss Somers!" he exclaimed. "Maria! Can it be possible that anything which concerns me can be of interest to her? Impossible!"

Half beside himself with the newly gained idea, he pressed his lips to the forehead of the unconscious girl. Her eyes opened with a look of alarm; she sought to disengage herself from the arm which he had thrown around her. Anna quietly glided away unnoticed.

It was sometime after this, that she tapped at the door of the apartment.

"May I come in?" she asked.

"You have permission," answered Willis from within.

"I merely returned to ask if you would not require some addition to your linen before setting out," said Anna, with a demure look and with her hand still on the door knob. "You men are always so forgetful."

Willis colored highly, and was unable to reply. So amusing appeared his confusion, that not even Maria could wholly refrain from laughing.

"I have changed my mind," he was at length able to say.

"You will remain then, and take the ten thousand pounds?"

"Have done with your bantering," exclaimed Willis, glancing at his interrogatrix with a vexation half real, half simulated.

"Am I to be denied my woman's privilege of tongue exercise?" rejoined Anna. "But hold;

I will be merciful, since you and Maria appear to be on such good terms with each other. You must have made excellent use of your time during my absence, master Willis. And now, 'Sir Benedict the married man,' for such I perceive you are soon to be, I pray you divulge to me the day on which you discard your bachelorship. There's no escaping a candid answer, for I can read in the mirror of your eyes your fate's fixed conclusion."

NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP.

BY EMMA CARLISLE.

Gently, gently draw the curtains
From the children's little bed;
Kiss the proffered pouting rose-lips,
Smooth each little curling head.
Softly, sweetly hear the murmur,
Breaking through the stillness deep,
Of the much-loved, childish prayer:
"Now I lay me down to sleep."

Little Annie, like the violets
Are the shadows of her eyes,
And within their telltale vision
Read we dreamings of the skies.
Like a rosebud fresh and dewy,
From the yielding stem just risen,
So is she a thing of beauty,
Half of earth and half of heaven.

Brother Will, that soul of mischief,
With his wealth of golden hair
Tossed in many a gleaming wavelet
Off his brow so full and fair,
Still he is, for a great wonder,
While his black eyes wink and peep,
And his curly head keeps nodding
To the tune, "Let's go to sleep."

Twins in age, and twins by nature,
Are the youngest of the four;
Lovingly they watch their mother,
As she passes through the door.
Rose and Lily has she named them,
Fitting type of all most fair,
And beautiful in flower creation,
Yes, those little cherubs are.

Dovellike eyes, whose changing color
Words of earth can ne'er describe,
White arms clasped round each other,
Lie the sisters, side by side;
Dimpled cheeks pressed to the pillow,
Gaze they on a brilliant star,
Shining through the open window,
Up within the vault afar.

"Lily," Rose said, in a whisper,
"Don't you think the stars above
Are the windows of the angels,
Whence they look on those they love?"

"For they shine so very brightly,
Oft I think that angel eyes
Look upon me through the window,
From that star up in the skies;

And I wonder, dearest Lily,
If our little prayer they speak,
Up within that world of beauty,
'Now I lay me down to sleep.'"

Tenderly and very lightly
Falls the gentle mother's tread,
Stooping o'er her spotless treasures,
Visiting each little bed,
When the morning sun its radiance
Through the children's room had spread;
But her cheek grows whiter, whiter
Than the morning robe she wore;
As her eyes fell on the youngest,
Fainted she upon the floor:
Little Rose's waxen figure
Knows no mortal heart's quick beat;
For the last time they have heard her
Pray, "I lay me down to sleep."

There was weeping wild and mourning
Through the household band that day;
Mourned they for the little sister,
Who from earth had passed away;
But, sweet Lily, while the teardrops
Fell upon each trembling hand,
Said, "I know dear Rose's happy
Up in that sweet star-land."

And at night she spoke unto them:
"Sister, brother, let us wait,
Till dear Rose safely enters
Through the narrow golden gate.

"Sweetly, sweetly comes the starlight
Through the window, calm and fair;
Now I think that she is ready
For to say her little prayer."

Softly, softly rose the murmur,
Through the stillness pure and deep;
And that prayer was heard in heaven,
"Now I lay me down to sleep."

HAPPY IN GOD.

Christians might avoid much trouble and inconvenience, if they would only believe what they profess—that God is able to make them happy without anything else. They imagine that if such a dear friend were to die, or such and such blessings to be removed, they should be miserable; whereas God can make them a thousand times happier without them. To mention my own case, God has been depriving me of one blessing after another; but as every one was removed, he has come in and filled up its place; and now, when I am a cripple, and not able to move, I am happier than ever I was in my life before, or ever expected to be; and, if I had believed this twenty years ago, I might have been spared much anxiety.—Last Days of Dr. Payson.

Never condemn your neighbor unheard, however many the accusations which may be preferred against him; every story has two ways of being told, and justice requires that you should hear the defence as well as the accusation, and remember that the malignity of enemies may place you in a similar situation.

THE CONTENTED MAN.

Why need I strive or sigh for wealth?
It is enough for me
That Heaven hath sent me strength and health,
A spirit glad and free;
Grateful these blessings to receive,
I sing my hymn at morn and eve.

On some, what floods of riches flow;
House, herds, and gold have they;
Yet life's best joys they never know,
But fret their hours away.
The more they have, they seek increase;
Complaints and cravings never cease.

THE SCARF OF PRINCE CHARLES.

BY WILLIAM B. OLIVER.

AH! that little secluded Scotch manse! How brightly bloomed the purple heather on the hill-sides and over the moor! and how sweetly came the dim, distant chimes from the bells of Edinburgh towers, across the blue stream that separated the village from the "grand auld toun."

Bird and bee and blossom! In this sweet and quiet spot, nothing disturbed either. The squirrel came forth fearlessly, to gather nuts at the very doorstep, where the trees overhung the roof; and the brown robin perched on the window sill, to pick the crumbs laid there for itself, by the hands of fair Jeannie Cameron. There, in that arm-chair, sat the minister, good old Archie Cameron; and quietly in another corner, knitting-work in hand, was old Aunt Alice, the sister of the venerable man, whose wife lay yonder where the setting sunbeam slants across the narrow green mound. And in the fork of the oak tree that spreads its hundred arms wide over the smooth sward, sits sweet Jeannie Cameron, her soft blue eyes bent over a book, and her light curls floating over her fair white shoulders. What a loving look the old man casts upwards to that sweet face! while Aunt Alice inwardly frets to see the lassie spending so much idle time that might be so much better taken for knitting the minister's winter hose.

A light laugh from the tree, and a responsive fond word from Mr. Cameron, complete the old lady's ire. "You'll hae trouble enow wi' yon lassie, if ye lea' her to sic idle do-naethin' ways, I'm thinkin'," burst from her lips.

"Nay, Ailee, she's but a child yet. Dinna be too harsh wi' her. She is an unco guid lassie to her puir old father; and we must treat her gently."

Aunt Ailee was somewhat silenced by this, but she could not help recurring to it again when, after a long half-hour, Jeannie still sat in the tree.

How beautiful she looked in her tartan of shaded greens, contrasting with her pure complexion, on which the sun and wind had no power save to deepen a rosy flush!

"Dinna fash wi' the wark, Ailee," said the minister again. "Jeannie is no for wark, I ken weel; but I remember it was a' the same with a young Ailee Cameron, years ago. And there is sma' reason to doubt that the little lassie may come round into her ways of smartness and cleverness as our Southron neighbors ca' it."

The aged spinster was partly mollified by this remark, and said, "Ah, weel, gin ye are satisfied, it's no for me to fin' fault."

She stopped short, for over the greensward, there came a tall figure, with long, unequal strides, long fair hair escaping from a Scottish bonnet, and a scarf of very peculiarly blended tartan, hanging carelessly from one shoulder.

A bright, roguish glance at the tree, from the blue eyes of the stranger, and a reverent look at the venerable old man, made two friends at once for the tired traveller.

"Wha's that?" asked Aunt Ailee, in a fretful, peevish tone. "A' the vagrants come to the minister's. Remember that there is only a sma' wee drap o' ale i' the barrel; so dinna ask yon stragglin' body to take ale."

The traveller approached, and as he stood on the doorstep, a sudden thought seemed to glance across the old man. He rose, and went to the door, and beckoned the stranger into the room, which the spinster had hastily left, knowing that if she allowed her brother's interference with the pantry arrangements, he would insist upon a fine roasted moor fowl which she had saved for his own supper, and various other delicacies which she thought quite too good for wandering beggars.

Jeannie still sat in the tree, uncertain whether she would be wanted or not; but the minister called her away; and blushing like a rose, she heard her father's whispered introduction of his daughter to "one whom we love and honor maist under heaven!"

Jeannie started in glad surprise. Her little hand trembled in the grasp of the stranger, and she would fain have dropped on one knee before him, had he not restrained her.

"No, no, lassie! time enough for that," dropping his voice, and pressing a gallant kiss upon the cheek which no man, save her father, had ever kissed before. "Time enough for that, when the prince comes to his own!"

"Ay, Jeannie!" said the minister, "we maun be prudent. The very wa's may hae lugs to hear news like this. But, gang and help Ailee, and just whisper wha she'll hae to entertain."

Half an hour of the united efforts of Ailee and her niece served to place a noble feast upon the table; for notwithstanding Miss Cameron's previous asseverations to the contrary, the ale foamed and sparkled in profusion, and not only the handsome moorfowl, but a goodly array of Scotch dainties, crowned the board. Many indeed were the hampers of game and other rarities from Edinburgh, that reached the minister; the gift of grateful pupils who had never forgotten their kind, old tutor; so that Glenburne was never without the means to furnish forth a generous repast.

Miss Ailee Cameron came courtseying and fidgetting into the room, with as near an approach to blushing, as her withered cheek could summon. The stranger bowed over her hand, and pressed it to his lips. How many days passed, ere the spinster allowed water to touch the exact spot upon her hand, which had been touched by royalty!

Twilight came and went, and the night was fast deepening, when the stranger was consigned to a chamber where everything was cool and sweet, and smelling of the fragrant heather.

"And, O, Jeannie, darlin', to think of his comin' aneath our humble roof!" said the minister, to his child, as he bade her good-night. "Surely a blessing will be upon these walls forevermore, since his footstep has trodden these floors!"

Jeannie could not answer, for her own heart was full of the strange and unexpected visit. She retired to bed, but not to sleep; and Miss Cameron's prolonged talk from the adjoining room, as she chattered through the open door, about the distinguished stranger whom she had mistaken for a beggar, rang upon her nerves like the clashing of steel. At length the clatter ceased, and the maiden, just before morning, sank into a doze, from which she sprang up to see the dawn far advanced. Already her father and the stranger were walking in the garden; the prince with his arm thrown affectionately over the old man's shoulder.

Jeannie was about to join them, when she was stopped by Miss Cameron, who called her to help her with the breakfast, and she turned towards the kitchen with a half petulant air, which fortunately escaped the lady's observation; and she only said, to her disappointed niece, "We maun set a gran' table for the p—." Jeannie's hand was placed on her mouth.

"Dinna say it, Aunt Ailee! Somebody may hear it, and do mischief."

"Lord save us!" retorted the wrathful woman, "what's come over the lassie to order her betters not to speak?"

Jeannie apologized humbly; for she both loved and feared Miss Cameron, who indeed was the only mother she had ever known.

A month passed, and still the wanderer lingered. What evening and morning rambles by rocky cairn, by bubbling burn, through deep forest and over tracks of moor, all a-bloom with purple heather! What softly whispered words had Jeannie heard, what love ballads had she sung in the depths of the woods, and how often had the rosy cheek flushed rosier, as the lips that had imprinted the first kiss repeated it again and again! Yet Jeannie was conscious of no wrong; for had not her father smiled upon that first kiss! Ah, Jeannie! Jeannie Cameron!

"Going? Going to-morrow!" burst from Jeannie's lips, as the prince announced his intention, with his arm about her neck. She did not repulse it, for the same arm had been about her father's neck that very morning, nay, every morning, as they walked in the garden, for the last month.

The old man sat within doors, fearlessly trusting his child with him whom he had taught her to love and reverence next to God. Miss Cameron partook of this feeling, without giving vent to a single dissenting tone; which was contrary to her usual custom; but Miss Cameron was one who "put her trust in princes."

Had not Miss Cameron slept so soundly that night she might have heard half-stifled sobs from her niece's chamber; and had she not been so occupied with getting up a grand farewell breakfast, she might have seen the almost frantic look which the unhappy girl cast upon the face that was turning away from the door. But it was all lost upon her. Jeannie's red eyes were thought to be a very natural consequence of her parting from her sovereign prince, uncertain whether he would ever occupy the throne; and as for Mr. Cameron, he was too much absorbed in his guest's departure, to notice any one.

The prince himself seemed full of sorrowful thoughts. He parted from them all without a word, and turned sadly down the path to the high road.

"Jeanie, love," said her father, "I am too feeble this morning to walk; but tak' your plaid, and gang as far as the Lady's Well, with our guest. We will not let him depart alone."

At the mention of the Lady's Well, Jeannie shuddered. She knew the dreary legend that belonged to it. A sad, sad tale it was, of woman's love and man's treachery—a tale that told of a haunting spirit, still wandering there at evening, and breathing wild words of deep and bitter woe. When she returned from that walk, she went to her own room, where, for hours, she wept over the scarf which her royal lover had bound around her white shoulders—the scarf of many colored tartan which had fallen from his neck, on the day of his arrival.

She remembered bitterly how her father had spoken of the prince leaving a blessing in the old manse, that very night! Every day and hour those words recurred to her mind. Every day and hour, the girl's cheek grew paler and paler, her eyes more dim and her step slower. And yet neither her father nor Miss Cameron remarked it, nor noticed scarcely at all that her appetite failed.

But soon they saw plainly enough that her intellect was not as clear as usual. She gave incoherent answers to their questions, and avoided speaking if possible. Roused to this fact, the unhappy old man remembered that insanity had been in her mother's family for generations.

He rose one morning to the terrible knowledge that his child was gone. All that the strictest search could do, was done, but in vain. Nothing was heard of her, and the minister settled down to a dreary sense of desolation, that was only borne at all because Christian submission was given him.

Years afterwards, an aged man, with long, silvery hair, dressed in mourning, yet with a faded scarf about his waist, sat down by a garden railing, where some children were at play. One of these children was a little girl, who afterwards when grown up, traced with a powerful pen,* the romance of history lingering about two of the "immortal names that were not born to die," William Wallace, and that other hero, whose brave heart, the Douglas threw into the battlefield, to animate the flagging courage of the troops—Robert Bruce. The evident weakness of the poor gentleman touched the heart of the little girl, who tenderly enticed him into her mother's house. The lady was a widow—made so by the war of 1745.

Once within the house, his whole attention was absorbed in a military sketch of the position of the two armies at Minden, over which hung the sword of the lady's dead husband. Mournfully he remarked, that he, too, had been a soldier in his youth.

"I, too, fought and fell! In the year forty-five, I received a wound worse than death; I shall never recover from it! Kind lady, I told your children I was unfit for any shelter but the wide heavens; yet my wound harms no one but myself."

On urging him to come back, he said, "I cannot—I ought never to have come back anywhere. Sin should always be an outcast!"

"Nay, sir," said the lady, "the followers of Prince Charles were unfortunate—might be mistaken; but their fidelity could never be a sin!"

He became paler and more wild-looking while she spoke, and hastily left the house, leaving the lady and her children in tears at his evident distress.

A few evenings afterwards, the same person, in crossing the Canongate towards Holyrood House, slipped on a stone and fell. A cart passed over him at the same moment, and he was taken up insensible and carried to the infirmary. An old Jacobite sergeant present, recognized Prince Charles's colors in the faded scarf—colors worn only by himself, and distinct from the common royal tartan.

The sufferer was consigned to surgical care, the broken limbs were set, and the discovery made that it was a woman who claimed the pity and respectful sympathy of the attendants. Death seemed very near to the frail, suffering being, and she was told so. She would give no name, but told them to send to Glenburne manse for those who would give her a Christian burial.

The next day they came—the venerable minister of Glenburne, and his sister—both tottering with the weight of years and sorrow. No questions were asked them—no explanations made; but the poor creature whose sufferings were over, was dressed in a white shroud by the hands of the aged woman, and the scarf of Prince Charles, which she had worn ever since he folded it around her, was wrapped about the still beautiful clay. In the language of the writer above named, "it had been the cherished covering of her too faithful, though penitent, and often distracted heart. Knowing this, the Christian hand which spread it there in death, felt, that He who said, 'I will have mercy and not sacrifice,' and whose redeeming goodness had sealed the pardon of so true a Magdalen, would not count as a sin this last act of sympathy with the melancholy tenderness of a fond woman's heart."

So let womanly charity hallow the lonely grave beneath the oak tree at Glenburne, where the fair, young maiden used to sit, with golden locks falling upon the pages before her. And let womanly charity, too, blot out the memory of her one fault, and cling only to the remembrance of her temptation and sufferings. Thus let us think of Jeannie Cameron.

* Jane Porter, author of "The Scottish Chiefs"

THE GRAVE BY THE GATE.

BY MARGARET VERNÉ.

Come by my gate an elm tree stands;
Above my head its branches wave,
And at my feet its leaves fall down,
Like emerald tears upon a grave.

A grave with pansies at its foot,
And clustering roses at its head;
From which the summer drops its smiles,
In blossoms rich above the dead.

A grave, like one dark wave of green
Uprising from the quiet earth,
To sweep from out my heart each thought
To which a weary hope gives birth.

A grave whose kindly circling arms
Clasp one who gave me only hate;
Hold one whose darkly drifting years
Swept, night-like, over all my fate.

I cannot make him now as dead;
His lips are white, but not with death;
The curses leaping from his mouth
But wrestle with his panting breath.

I watch this slender breadth of green—
I train these roses as they grow;
Praying to God no sound may wake
The angry sleeper lying low.

Praying! My prayer is but a bird,
With one wing love and one wing hate;
The brighter cannot strike God's heaven,
With such a crippled, maimed mate!

The brighter holds with gentle touch
The dearest hope a soul may know;
The darker draggles in the depths
Of Hades' waters as they flow.

The brighter—Father, give it strength!
I feel it quicken—see it grow!
The heavens are opening at its touch!
Thy name be praised!—the mountains go!

My woman's heart is sweet in tears;
The grave is stilled—is stilled to-day;
And to my side there presses strong,
A love my soul shall know for aye.

THE GREEK LOVERS.

BY HERBERT LINTON.

THE moon was faintly rising over the loveliest island of the Archipelago—the "Grecian autumn's gentlest eve" melting into deeper night amid the soft and lovely valleys and the grand old hills of Scio. Along the waves, a radiant streak of moonlight lay lovingly, sparkling like gems with each motion of the waters; while above the mountain peak a single star hung like a diamond in the pure blue of the heavens.

From the gardens beneath the terraces, came up the softly blending odors of orange, lemon and almond trees, and mingling with them, the fragrance of the luxuriant plants and flowers that grow wildly upon those beautiful shores. Beyond, was a bolder range of rugged mountains; and yet again, other ranges that were blooming to their summits; while the sea lay beneath, calm as a summer lake, an open-decked caique rocking upon her bosom near the shore.

Upon one of these terraces, a young Greek was talking in the low, persuasive tones in which lovers only express their thoughts. And truly, in Sappho's land there lived no maiden who might so well have resembled that unhappy songstress, as the beautiful and intellectual Ianthe Tharbores. Not in her misfortunes—for she was happy in the love of Demetrius Malletus, and already her father, one of the most able merchants of the Levant, had sanctioned their attachment.

They were to be wedded in a few months, waiting only for the delightful abode they had projected to receive its finishing touches and embellishments; and, meanwhile, the lovers duly spent this lovely hour of twilight together.

All this day Ianthe had been haunted by a strange presentiment of coming evil—such as will force itself upon the mind, at certain times, and which is sometimes followed by a startling reality. Before Demetrius had joined her, she had walked, scores of times, over the beautiful mosaic court yard belonging to her father's house, and stopped as often before the stone reservoir, over which was a grape-vine twining about the marble columns. Never before had the charms of this spot failed to interest her; but now, she could only lean her cheek against the cold pillar, and weep with an undefined dread of something—she knew not what.

Her lover laughed at her fears, rallied her upon her low spirits, and talked to her of the future and its coming happiness. She smiled, but with a pale and wintry smile; and finding that she was not to be comforted by words, he sat down upon a low bench that stood near the steps of the terrace, and drawing her head to his bosom, he tried to soothe her with one of the wild chants peculiar to the Greek boatmen. Under its quieting influence her nerves grew calmer. They sat there until midnight—long after the diamond star they had admired had sunk far below the hill over which it had hung.

And now rose up the wilder music of a procession, making its way in the midnight towards the Greek church, their torches shedding a strange light over the gardens as they passed, and glittering upon the dew laden trees. While they were still passing, a sound was heard which made every torch drop from the hand that held it. It startled the lovers from their dream, and they sprang upon their feet; and in a moment Ianthé's father was upon the terrace beside them, and almost frantic to save his daughter from the coming peril.

"What is it, father—dear father? What is it that you dread so much?"

"Did you not hear? Demetrius, did you not hear the sound of the Turkish cannon? Already the wretches are here upon the island—and O, my God! what mercy will they shew to any? least of all, to poor defenceless children like this?" And the strong man shook like the quivering aspen above him, with the intensity of his emotions.

There was no time for tears. The father passed his arm about the girl, and bore her to a recess behind the reservoir, the entrance of which was invisible, but which enclosed a flight of steps leading to a room beneath, where the family had often concealed treasures in their frequent absences from home. The little orphan Albanian boy, who had waited upon Ianthé, was hastily aroused from his slumbers and placed with her, some food and water and a few bottles of wine carried in, and then the blue stone, that formed the narrow door, replaced—with directions how to open it from within, should aught happen to the father and lover. The two then joined the band of affrighted Greeks, who, unarmed and defenceless, lay at the cold mercy of the bloodhounds whose cruel butchery had already more than commenced.

Fifty thousand Turks were burning and ravaging the sweetest spot on which the sun ever shone; and the hapless Sciotes, although numbering probably nearly as many capable of bearing arms as their destroyers, were unprepared to strike a single blow in defence of the thousands and tens of thousands of helpless old men, women and children, who were looking to them for aid, in the brief space between them and death or slavery.

Who does not remember the agonized heart-cry that was borne to us by every breeze across the sea? Who does not remember when gentle women and little children, even, in our own more favored land, devoted their strength to the purpose of aiding their unhappy Greek sisters? when noble men, God's highest image upon earth, took their lives in their hands, and went forth to the help of their Greek brothers?

"Cold is the heart, fair Greece! that looks on thee

Nor feels as lovers o'er the dust they loved;

Dull is the eye that will not weep to see

Thy walls defaced, thy mouldering shrines removed."

In the brief but terrible strife following that evening, Demetrius and the father of Ianthé were taken prisoners, and reserved with the memorable "forty hostages," most of whose bodies hung in a dreary row from the castle. Even the horrible outrages that were witnessed, lately, beneath the burning skies of India, did not exceed those which were enacted upon the calm shores of the Archipelago. But it is in vain to recall the dark prints of the Moslem's footsteps.

Ianthé waited in agony, until she could endure it no longer; and when the noise at length ceased, she proposed to leave the hiding-place. Constantine, the little page, entreated her to allow him to go and reconnoitre, and then return for her. But this she would not allow; so they proceeded together. What a sight met her eyes! The smoking and blackened ruins of her home awaited her, and a silence, like that of the dead, reigned unbroken. The beautiful stone houses of a handsome brown color, surrounded by marble balustrades, belonging chiefly to the rich merchants of Scio, were now a mass of stained and blackened walls. Three of these had belonged to the father and uncles of Demetrius, and one to a relative of her own. Not a soul was visible. Ianthé went into the lonely houses. On the marble floors the fires had been kindled, destroying pictures, furniture and hangings, and in some, the walls had fallen down with the heat.

But this desolation, although so complete and dreadful, scarcely touched her heart. Her thoughts were with the dear ones whom she missed, and the deep cry of her soul was for her father and lover. But where could she go, or to whom could she apply for assistance? Of the hundred and ten thousand inhabitants of Scio, only a fifth part had escaped, while the rest had been murdered or sold into slavery. The returning fugitives told her this, as they gathered to their ruined homes. That her father had met with one of these fates, she was well assured; and the thought of his gray head trampled in the dust, or bowing as a slave to the Moslem, was too much for her to bear. Now her miserable presentiment came back to her memory, as fresh as on that day—the last day that she had seen those most dear to her heart.

Among the bodies that had been found, was that of a little Albanian girl, Constantine's cousin, Ida Parios, and the tender grief of the boy over his only relative touched Ianthé to the very soul, amid her own deeper sorrows.

Marcus Tharbores had escaped to the mountains, from thence in a caïque to Spain, and from thence into Italy; but his daughter's uncertain fate brought him back before he knew whether it would be safe for him to visit her hiding-place or not. A weak, feeble old man, struck down as by a thunderbolt, he returned to the spot which he had left well, strong and active. But she was there, in the otherwise desolate home, and was safe!

The cares of Ianthe and Constantine soon restored him to comparative health; but nothing could make the Greek maiden smile while Demetrius was dead or suffering, as she believed him. Not daring to leave the ruins until some tidings of him should be known, she and her father decided to remain in the habitable part of their dwelling, at least for the present; yet still with fear and anxiety. They knew not how soon before the iron heel might be crushing them again.

They were all three sitting upon the terrace, one golden evening, when the last beams of the radiant sunset were tinging the darkened walls of the buildings, and all things reminded Ianthe of the last peaceful eve that she had known there. Her quickened hearing discerned the sound of footsteps in the distance, and ere long a form was seen through the shrivelled branches of the lime grove. Her heart throbbed wildly, and a sudden dizziness made her almost fall from her seat. Constantine saw and heard, too; but her father made no sign.

"Who can it be, dearest lady?" whispered the boy. "Some news, perhaps."

"Hush! let me listen to those footsteps. They are his, Constantine! let me go to him."

And scarcely a second had passed, ere she had floated down the avenue of limes, and was pressed to the living, beating heart of Demetrius! A spirit had seemed to whisper sweet tidings in her ear, and break the sudden truth more gently. The first unlooked for sight of his face might else have killed her.

We cannot linger, except in thought, over a meeting like this. Life hath few moments of perfect happiness; and theirs was dashed by the awful shadow of the Past, and by that indescribable dread of the Future which, until Greece was once more free and happy, must have hovered over her children's wronged and bleeding hearts.

MUSIC.

Now Music feedeth on the silent air,—
Like Ocean, who upon the moonlight shores
Of lone Sigeum, steals with murmuring noise,—
Devouring the bright sands and purple slopes,
And so, content, retires;—yet music leaves
Her soul upon the silence, and our hearts
Hear, and forever hoard those golden sounds,
And reproduce them sweet in after hours.

BARRY CORNWALL.

THE DEAD.

"Earth to earth" and "dust to dust" seems to have been the undeviating custom of primeval man. Adam, according to Persian tradition, was buried in the Island of Serendib, and mighty lions, for a long period, guarded the burial spot. The resting places of the first glorious women of the world are still pointed out by Holy Land gnostics—Eve and Sarah—Rebecca and Leah, sleep their last sleep, all quietly in the dust. Nor was it till later ages that any other custom obtained, and that imported from a foreign land. Isaac was the first of the great patriarchate, who, by his son Joseph, was swathed in cere cloths, and so embalmed, placed in one of the huge monolithic coffins of Egypt. Burning the bodies of the dead had probably its origin in the desire to prevent ill treatment being offered them.

KEEPING PROMISES WITH CHILDREN.

A gentleman of nervous temperament once called on Dr. Dwight, President of Yale College. One of the doctor's boys was rather boisterous, and postured the nervous gentleman somewhat, whereupon he said to him, "My boy, if you will keep still while I am talking to your father, I will give you a dollar." Instantly the boy hushed down calm as a sleeping lamb. At the close of the gentleman's remarks, he attempted to leave without giving the boy the dollar; but Dr. Dwight was too fast for him. He put a dollar into the man's hands, saying, "You promised my boy a dollar for good behaviour. Give him that, as you promised. If, sir, we lie, our children will be liars also."—Independent.

SILESIAN GRAVES.

The word "beautiful" is peculiarly applicable to the Silesian cemeteries, which I have never seen exceeded in neatness. The Germans, who are generally fond of flowers, have adopted them as symbols of affection for their departed friends; and every grave is planted with clusters of lilies, primroses, violets and forget-me-nots, with here and there an evergreen. This method of cherishing the memory of those we love, is at once simple and touching; the hand of the mourner rears its fragile emblems of human life, mingles her tears on the leaves with the dew of heaven, and when the blossoms wither and die, remembers the resurrection, of which all nature is a type, and is comforted.—Milard.

NEVER DESPAIR.

True hope is based on energy of character. A strong mind always hopes, and has always cause to hope, because it knows the mutability of human affairs, and how slight a circumstance may change the whole course of events. Such a spirit, too, rests upon itself; it is not confined to partial views, or to one particular object, and if at last all should be lost, it has saved itself—its own integrity and worth. Hope awakens courage, while despondency is the last of all evils; it is the abandonment of good—the giving up of the battle of life with dead nothingness. He who can implant courage in the human soul, is its best physician.—Van Knebel.

DAY-DREAMS.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

On the pleasant bank where the wild thyme grows,
And the scented breeze from the meadow blows,
I have laid me down 'neath the cloud-hung sky,
While the limpid rill that wanders by,
The gentle murmur of wind-blown trees,
The song of birds and the hum of bees,
Like fairy strains o'er my senses glide,
In a soothing, lulling, peaceful tide.
Yet a sombre thought o'er my heart will steal,
And its gloom and sorrow quick reveal,
For still in each voice and whisper gay
That floats abroad on this summer day,
I have heard a sad and an earnest tone,
A soft lament and a love-breathed moan;
Yes—these are the words they seem to say:

"Thou must pass away—thou must pass away!"

Is not earth to me still fair and bright?
Do I hail with tears each morning's light?
Has my heart grown old?—do I hear no more
With joy thy steps at my cottage door?
Have I ceased, perchance, to call thee friend,
Or wished that these heartsome days might end?
Do I see no more in my nightly dream
Her angel pinion brightly gleam?
Nay—and still I turn from these scenes of earth,
At the voice to which these scenes give birth,
And a shadow, garbed in a mantle gray,
Ever falls, at the words, "thou must pass away!"

O, give me still mid these scenes to dwell,
Not yet to utter a last farewell!
Let me hold thy hand, my friend of old,
Nor yet may our sad adieus be told!
Let me wander still on the earth's warm breast,
Nor yet in her frigid bosom rest!
Still stroll at night on the moonlit hill,
And list to the plaintive whip poor-will:
Still shun the darkness and seek the light,
As a little child in its time of flight;
Still sail awhile on life's placid lake,
Nor cower in fear where its billows break!
"It may not be! Thou hast lingered long," Saith the wearying voice in its saddened song:
"Thou hast had thy joy, thou hast kept thy feast,
Thy days with mirth have still increased,
And now, even now, in thy heart's fair May,
Thou must pass away—thou must pass away!"

THE TORY'S NIECE.

BY MRS. CAROLINE A. SOULE.

"No, no, Bessie; this is the pleasantest way home," and Arthur Mervale gently took his companion's hand, and led her away from the dusty turnpike and over a sweet-smelling clover field, to where a thick growth of low willows marked the meandering of a beautiful river. Parting the lithe young trees, they soon stood upon its green banks and watched for awhile in silence the golden and crimson tides which the sunset rolled over the dense forest that skirted the opposite shore, and the softly waving shadows which lay in the depths of the clear water.

"Let us sit down here awhile, Bessie, and enjoy the glorious evening;" and pointing to the mossy root of an old oak, he motioned her to rest herself there, and then threw himself on the short grass at her feet.

"It grows late, Arthur," said the young girl, as the shadows in the river lengthened and the sunshine on the forest faded. "My uncle will worry. Let us go," and she half rose to her feet.

"Not yet, Bessie. You and I will soon see turbulent times, darling. Your uncle even now suspects my whiggery. Once convinced of it, our interviews will be at an end. I have borne much for your sake, dearest, but when the rapture really comes, as come it must soon, I must show my colors. I cannot for a moment defend King George and his red-coated crew. My sympathies, my exertions, my very life itself, must be active in the cause of the colonists, for truly their grievances are terrible. So Bessie, sit still yet awhile."

He took her hand and fondly clasped it. He had never yet told his love in words, but his eloquent eyes had spoken it many times, and the maiden had long known she was very dear to his heart. But now, in the quiet of that June twilight, he whispered to her all the depth and strength of his affection, and when she suffered him to fold her to his bosom in such a warm, tender caress, he felt that her lips, could she have mastered her emotion enough to speak, would have answered him in thrilling tones.

"Now we will go home," said he. "Come what will, my spirits will never falter after this, for now I know you love me better than any other earthly one, and I know too that Bessie Van Zandt's vows are never lightly taken."

It was a pleasant path, winding close by the river. Soft dews fell upon their heads; the incense of wild flowers, freshened by the evening's coolness, floated all about them; the waters rippled against the shores in low music-tones; the moon shed a soft light on the scene, flecking the turf with waving lines of silver, and giving a fairy-like beauty to the calm waves of the Mohawk; a holy calmness seemed to have settled over everything, and one could almost fancy the earth was on her knees silently telling her vesper prayer.

"How sweet to die just now," whispered the maiden. "Heaven seems very near."

"Sweeter to live, my darling, for heaven is here, in our own hearts—but hark! I hear the dip of paddles. Conceal yourself a moment in the forest, while I creep into that thicket and see who's coming. These are dangerous times, and we must look out for foes on every side."

Scarcely had the maiden sheltered herself from observation behind the massive trunk of an olden elm, and the youth himself in a thick growth of briers, whose tangled branches bent over the shore and swayed into the beaming water, ere there shot out from behind a little headland a light canoe with two oarsmen. They had evidently been drinking, for their talk, though loud and earnest, was strangely incoherent, and Arthur, though he listened keenly, could only glean from their broken, stuttering words, that a battle had been fought between the colonists and British soldiers, and that they were carrying the news to old Ben Van Zandt, the uncle of Bessie.

"Don't tremble so, darling," said the young man, tenderly, as the little boat out of sight and hearing, he hurried to the hidden girl. "No harm can reach you now, for are you not mine own."

"But those men, Arthur. Did you not recognize them. I should know their voices in a thousand. They are Rupert Van Alstyne's cronies, and hideous and gross as he is, they are yet more so. Satan himself could ask no fitter tools for his darkest deeds. I always shudder but to see them, and now they are going straight to my uncle's. I pray God, Rupert do not follow them."

"There have been rumors afloat, Bessie, that your uncle would once have wedded you to him; is it so?"

"It is, Arthur;" and she clung closer to his arm, and then whispered hurriedly, "he would have sold me. Uncle, you know, is guardian to myself, and has until I come of age, the sole control of all the money my father left me. Rupert agreed to relinquish to him two thirds of my dowry, if he could by any means, fair or foul, force me to marry him. O, Arthur, heaven and my own heart only knows what I have suffered from their persecutions. Of late, though, they have ceased to trouble me, and left me comparatively free, but I fear it is but some ruse. I tremble every hour lest I hear my uncle thunder out his commands that I prepare to marry him." And she sobbed aloud.

Tender hands wiped away her tears, passionate kisses stilled the anguish of her heart, and soothed at length by the caresses and love-tones of her betrothed, the maiden ventured on, nearer and nearer her hated home.

As they emerged from the forest on to the wide-stretching lawn that surrounded the ample mansion of the Van Zandts, they beheld a crowd of neighbors, men, women and children, clustering about the two men who had arrived but a short time before in the canoe. They heard too, loud and vehement ejaculations, mingled with curses against the whigs and all who favored them.

"Can you steal into the house quietly and without their seeing you, dear?" asked Arthur, as he drew his companion again into the shadows of the woodland. "It will not be best for me to show myself to-night, for they seem terribly exasperated, and the sight of me might move your uncle to violence against you. I will watch here till I see a light in your chamber; and, Bessie, should aught befall you, a note hidden in the hollow of that old oak, beside which we sat this evening, will bring me to your side, though Rupert Van Alstyne and all his crew were your jailors. Go now, precious one," and he drew her yet again to his heart, and then watched her with a throbbing breast, as she glided noiselessly from one clump of shrubbery to another, till she gained the long grape arbor that led directly to the back porch. Five minutes later and a light shone from the casement of her room, while the white curtains were withdrawn and a figure which he knew to be hers, leaned forth as if to watch the evening's beauty. A moment he stood in lover-like reverence, viewing the sweet picture, and then turned hastily away into the forest and was soon far away.

Well was it for the maiden that she had lingered no longer with him beside the river's brink or on the edge of the dim woodland, for scarcely had she thrown aside her cape and bonnet and seated herself beside her work-stand, ere a heavy footstep was heard ascending the stairs, and in another instant a loud, imperative knock at the door. Seizing some needle-work that lay beside her, she said calmly, "Come in, sir," and then looked up as if wondering to see him.

"So you're home, are you, Miss Bessie?" exclaimed he, in disappointed tones. "Well, it's lucky for you, for if I had found you out scouting the woods with that chicken-hearted Mervale, you wouldn't have seen daylight again for many a long day. And now listen to me, girl. I've had news to-night,—curse the rebels and the name of Bunker Hill too—I say I've had news to-night, which will oblige me and every other King George man to buckle on their armor forthwith, and which will make me know too who are and who are not our friends; and, mark me, girl, you speak no more to Arthur Mervale till he shows his colors. If he put on the red coat, well and good—but if not," and he grated his teeth and hissed rather than spake—"I'll have his heart's blood out of him. And listen further.

In one week's time Rupert Van Alstyne will be here to join me and my troops. On the day after his arrival I shall give you to him—ay, marry you," and he bent his eyes fiercely on her. "To-morrow the wedding gear will arrive, and yourself and aunt and the girls in the neighborhood, may cut and sew as fast as your fingers can, for all must be ready without fail in eight days' time. And mind me, Bessie Van Zandt; one word from your lips against the match, and you are a prisoner in this room, on bread and water till the wedding day," and without waiting for the reply, which her quivering lips seemed striving to utter, he strode away, slamming the door violently after him.

With a groan that seemed to come from her heart's core, the poor girl threw herself on the bed and for hours lay weeping on her pillow. Not until the old clock in the hall had pealed the midnight chimes did she lift her weary head, but then she sat up and seemed for awhile lost in thought. Her uncle would have quailed could he have seen how stern grew the lines about her lips, and how passionate the glance in her dark eyes. Some desperate resolution was evidently about to be taken by the hitherto timid girl, for she soon rose, and lighting a fresh lamp, she noiselessly unclosed her door and crept on tip-toe to the dark garret. Fitting from amongst a bunch of keys that hung to her girdle, one to an enormous trunk, she took from it an old-fashioned black bonnet with a widow's veil, a dress and "cardinal" to match, a pair of antique shoes, some mourning gloves and a reticule. Carrying these down to her room and hiding them in her closet, she returned, and having re-locked the trunk, opened a chest filled to the brim with male apparel. Clean down to the bottom went her little hands, and then she shudderingly drew forth a brace of pistols, and with the exclamation, "they saved my father's life many and many a time—I'll see now if they will not save his daughter's honor," she hurriedly bore them to her hiding place. Then leaving the lamp, she groped down the broad staircase that led to the front door, and gliding like a ghost into the low, gloomy parlor, she opened a closet door and took from a drawer within it a heavy door key, and then rapidly regained her room.

"Now," said she to herself, as she flung her trembling limbs upon her bed, "now, I defy him. How lucky, nay," and she crossed her arms devoutly, "how providential that he once lost the key to my room, when he held me prisoner here, and was forced to forge another, and how blessed a moment was it, when I learned where he had hidden it, when he found the old one. Uncle, uncle, may God forgive you the sins you would commit against your brother's child—that brother too, who almost worshipped you," and then she prayed and strove to sleep, but not until day-light was streaming into her window did her troubled thoughts give her rest, and then her slumber was but a fitful one.

She met her aunt and uncle at the breakfast table with an assumed composure that did credit to her strength of nerves; she washed and replaced the breakfast dishes with a quiet, steady hand, and then telling Mrs. Van Zandt that the strawberries were ripe enough to gather, she threw on her sun-bonnet, took a couple of pails and went out towards the south meadow. For a long time her uncle stood and watched her as she flitted over the soft green grass, stooping at every other step to gather the scarlet clusters; then, seeming to be satisfied, he turned away, and mounting his horse which had been long waiting, he rode hastily to the north. An exultant smile rippled over Bessie's lips as she heard the trampling of old Ned's hoofs die away in the far distance; yet she still kept busy at her task, gradually however drawing nearer and nearer to the forest. Once under the shadow of its olden trees, she dropped her pails, half-full both of them with luscious berries, and darted like a fawn through its cool, dim paths, till a sudden angle brought her to the river's brink and only a few steps from the trysting tree. Drawing from her bosom a note, she hid it in the hollow, and then rapidly retraced her steps and was soon wandering over the green meadow, a low, flute-like note trembling in the soft cadences on her rich lips.

An hour afterwards and she entered the cool, airy kitchen, with both pails glowing to the brim with the delicious fruit, and handing them to her aunt, said carelessly, "I've been quick, haven't I, to gather so many?"

"Spry as ever, Bessie. I shall miss your nimble fingers much when you are gone—but come to the parlor now and see the new goods. Old Obadiah brought them up in his canoe just after you went out. See here," and she displayed satins, silks and laces, "you will have a bridal outfit such as a queen might covet."

"Indeed, aunt, I tell you once for all, I'll have none of it," said Bessie, and a queen might have envied her the dignity with which she spoke.

"Why, Bessie—Bessie—don't now, dear," began her aunt, who secretly feared old Ben Van Zandt as much as even did her niece, and who dreaded the effects of his wrathful temper if she should finally refuse to become Van Alstyne's bride; "make the best of it, dear. If he isn't handsome, he's rich you know, and—"

"Ugly as sin—bad as the evil one," interrupted Bessie, warmly. "I tell you, aunt, I will not marry Rupert Van Alstyne. I will die first and you may tell uncle so," and she swept from the room and hurried out on to the lawn and to the river's edge, where unmooring a little canoe, her own especial property, she paddled it to a little island about half a mile down the stream, where again securing it, she leaped on to the grassy bank and hid herself in a rustic arbor. For a few moments she was a pitiful sight, wringing her hands, beating her bosom and sobbing and wailing as though her heart were broken. But her emotions were too violent to linger long, and she soon grew quiet save that great tears rolled down her cheeks, while her lips moved impetuously. Suddenly a little bird, a yellow-throated warbler, lighted on the grape vine that swung above her head, and poured forth such a flood of melody that she involuntarily hushed her sobs to listen. Louder and more cheerily sung the bird, and presently another and yet another gathered on the bending bough, till it quivered beneath their tiny feet, and the whole golden air seemed but a breath of melody.

"Free and hence happy," murmured the maiden, as she sought in her pocket for a biscuit, and crumbled it at her feet. "If ye were captive how soon would your bright wings languish and your sweet tones be hushed. Eat them up, pretty ones," as they flew to the ground and gathered about the sweet morsels, "and then sing to me, for many a day may pass ere I listen again to the notes of these forest birds. It is my last day of freedom here—I know it—I feel it and"—with a sudden resolution, "I will enjoy it too." And rising, she wandered over the fairy isle, plucking the broad-bladed grass, the June roses and lilies, and the soft mosses that clung to the olden roots of the massive oaks. Then regaining her seat in the arbor, she braided the grasses into a necklace and bracelets, and wove a crown from the roses and lilies, and wreathing her dark curls and her fair bosom and snowy arms with the floral offerings, she leaned her head against a rustic column, and closing her eyes gave up her thoughts to a sweet reverie. She had not meant to sleep, but the low breathings of the wind among the leaves, the soft music-notes of the birds, the chanting of the waves against the little island, the ripple of the current as it swept over its rocky bed, were all mesmeric tones, and ere long lulled her into a slumber as deep and dreamless as that of nursery childhood.

Time passed on. The noon mark glided off the bank, and the lengthening shadows told that the evening hours were fast coming on. Still the maiden slept; but not long now is her quiet and blissful rest to remain undisturbed. A canoe comes sailing down the stream, urged on by strong and violent hands, even those of Benjamin Van Zandt and his two meet allies, the cronies of Van Alstyne, who had come up the eve before.

"She is here," growled the first, as he caught a glimpse of her little shallop, as it lay moored to the pretty isle. "Heaven grant we find her whig lover by her side!" But to his chagrin, nothing met his eyesight but the lovely girl, looking like some rare picture, as she lay there in her motionless beauty. Rudely does he arouse her, shaking her white shoulders with his brawny hand, and crying in her ear, "Wake up, you jade! wake up, I say!"

With a wild scream she opens her eyes, but a glance at the fierce-looking men about her so appalls her dreamy senses, that she sinks at once into unconsciousness. How long her swoon lasted she never knew, but when she again awoke to life she was a captive in her room, a cup of water and a slice of bread beside her. The last beams of sunset were streaming through the casement. She arose and looked out. A canoe was just putting off with the two fiends, and as it darted away, she heard her uncle say:

"Bid him not fail me. He must be here by Monday, for on Tuesday is the wedding."

"May be," murmured Bessie, and went back to bed. She counted the hours as they were chimed by the old clock, till twelve was struck. Then rising, she drew a sheet about her, and took her key from its hiding place. For an instant her heart failed her. "If he should have left the key in the lock," said she. But he hadn't, it rested beneath his sleeping head. She turned hers noiselessly, and opening the door passed through some back rooms till she came to the servant's stairs. Ascending, she entered the kitchen. The hearth was still warm, and uncovering the embers, she lighted a candle, and then taking a plate, and knife and fork, went resolutely down cellar. There was a stone closet there, and she knew well the way to it, for her own hands usually prepared the dainties that were set there to keep fresh and cool. Throwing off her sheet she prepared to partake of some supper, for she had eaten nothing since breakfast. Bits of cold chicken, currant tarts, seed cake and cream cheese made a very comfortable meal, after which, securing something as palatable for her subsistence the next day, she went back to the kitchen, blew out the candle and replaced it, and then stole noiselessly to her chamber, and back to bed.

Shortly after the usual breakfast hour, she heard her uncle's steps ascending the stairs. They paused at her door; then the key was fitted and turned in the lock, and he entered with a tray containing bread and water.

"Bessie," cried he; but no response came from the curtained bed. "Bessie! Bessie Van Zandt!" And his tone grew impatient.

"What?" said she at length, querulously.

"O, you're there, are you, you jade? I didn't know but you had jumped out of the window."

"I think too much of my neck," said she, crossly.

"O, you do, do you? Well, lest it should enter that young whig's brain to rescue you by a ladder, I'll see to-day that bars are fastened again into the old stanchions. But first I ask you, and I ask it for the last time, will you marry Rupert Van Alstyne?"

Bessie rose up in bed, and looking like a young priestess, with her loose white robes shrouding her shoulders, her long, dark hair pushed carelessly from her forehead, falling in heavy masses about her neck, she said with an emphasis that rung in his ears for many an hour:

"I tell you no! Benjamin Van Zandt; I always told you so. I will neither marry him, nor shall you have my gold."

"And I tell you you shall marry him!" thundered the uncle. "When you leave this room, you leave it to become a wife." And he turned away and locked the door.

"Ay," murmured Bessie, and a beautiful smile played about her lips, "for once you spoke the truth." And then she lay down again, nor did she lift her head all the weary day, save once, and that was when the blacksmith entered to rivet on the iron bars. But at midnight she sallied out again, took her supper in the gloomy cellar, and then, grown bolder by last night's security, went out upon the lawn, and stood awhile under the moonlight. And every evening she did the same till the Sabbath came. All that day she sat by the window cautiously watching every motion and noise of the household. She saw them all go out at half-past nine, and embarking in canoes, paddle up stream to the little settlement where the old Dutch church was built. She saw them come back at four in the afternoon, and knew just when they took their supper. She saw the cows 'drove home and milked, and then just before sunset, she watched her uncle and aunt and the two aged servants clamber into the farm wagon and drive off. She knew they were going to a prayer-meeting some four miles south, and she knew the house was deserted by all save Hannah, the trim little Dutch girl, whose lover came regularly on Sabbath evenings to do up his courting.

"Now is my time," said she. "To-morrow Rupert will be here, and he has a thousand eyes. Heaven aid me to escape them." And with childish reverence she sunk upon her knees and prayed. Rising, she undressed, and after forming out of blankets and sheets a something that resembled a human figure, she dressed it in her clothes and laid it carefully upon the bed and drew the curtains. Then arranging herself in the old-fashioned garments that had been her mother's years before, and hiding her father's pistols under the ample "cardinal," she unlocked the door, closed it and turning the key and carefully withdrawing it, went noiselessly down the front stairs and into the parlor. Here she crouched in silence for an half hour or more till she was satisfied that Hannah and John were deep in love's mysteries, when she ventured boldly out of the front door, and flying rather than walking across the lawn, was soon hidden in the welcome shadows of the forest. With hurried steps she ran on through its misty depths, nor paused to draw an easy breath till she had reached the old oak. Taking a note from its hollow, she hid it in her bosom, and then unfastening a light canoe that lay a few yards distant, she sprang into it and was soon sailing down the Mohawk. Five, ten, fifteen, twenty miles she glided, almost like a bird, too, for the wind and current were in her favor, and accustomed from childhood to a paddle, it required but little effort for her to sail so far.

"I must be near him now," said she, "for there twinkle the lights of the 'Plain' settlement." And turning the prow of her boat to a little cove, she fastened it to a sapling, and then springing on shore and hiding in a thicket, she cautiously sang the first line of an old fashioned love song. The midnight echoes caught it up, and the refrain came back to her from hill and river. She waited awhile and then sang again, but this time with a quivering lip. Again the echoes brought the sweet tones to her ear, but to her joy the song ended not with the last word she had so tremulously uttered; a second line sounded on the breeze, and rich and mellow were the tones, and in another instant, a manly form was bending over the canoe, and a manly voice crying:

"Bessie, dear Bessie, is it you?"

"Ay, Arthur." And the maiden glided from the thicket. She had forgotten her disguise, and wondered to see her lover stand so mutely before her. "Have you no words of greeting, Arthur; O, I have endured much for you."

"Bessie—is it Bessie?" And he held out his hand.

She comprehended it all then, and tearing off her bonnet stood before him in the moonlight with her soft dark curls drooping over cheeks and shoulders.

"It is my own, my darling!" And he clasped her fondly to his heart; but for a moment, though; then leading her up a steep bank and through some tangled underbrush to where the turnpike lay parallel to the river, he mounted her on a fleet steed, and leaping on to another, gave spurs to both, and never halted till at sunrise the little village of Schenectady lay at their feet. Arthur had friends there, trusty and generous ones, and they stood ready to welcome him and his fair friend. But only for a few hours did he accept their hospitality. When the noon stage set out for Albany, the two fugitives entered it, and the other passengers marvelled much at the chivalrous devotion the young man showed the aged lady, little dreaming of the fair brow, the radiant eyes, the crimson cheeks and sweet lips which were hidden underneath that widow's veil.

At sunset they crossed the Hudson, and midnight found them at an old farmhouse on the turnpike, between Albany and Hartford, the abode of one who had once been servant in Arthur's paternal home.

"Do you know of any safer place than this, for our little runaway?" asked Arthur the next morning, as they all sat in the old-fashioned porch, and he glanced affectionately at the pale, but beautiful face of Bessie.

"I think I do, Master Arthur," said the middle-aged man whom he addressed. "My wife and I talked the matter over this morning early, for well as we would like to have the lady's company ourselves, our home is too publicly situated and too often visited to be a very secure refuge for her. But," and he lowered his voice and looked cautiously about him, "but about five miles from here, in the depths of the forest, there resides an aged couple to whom Miss Bessie's presence would be not only acceptable, but agreeable in the highest degree, and once there her safety is secured, for not all King George's crew could spy the road that leads to that little cabin, for two miles of it is through a dark marsh, where every inch of ground quivers like quicksand beneath the lightest tread. I may tell you a little of their story. They are the descendants of high-born English families, and for years dwelt in stately halls, happy as their hearts could wish. But troubles many and dire came upon them. Their sons were dissolute, and came to untimely and violent deaths; their daughters, only two, but beautiful as angels—I have seen their portraits—married unprincipled men, and after a few years' absence from the parental home, came back to die of grief. And while yet their hearts were bleeding with these sorrows, accusations of treason were lodged against the father by those whom he had trusted in as brothers, and with only a moiety of his wealth he fled in the silence of night time. France first offered him an asylum; then Holland; but his persecutors were on his track, and in desperation he finally put the sea between him and his native land, and found an humble but secure home in the depths of yonder forest. Accident made them known to me some five years since. They were obliged to trust me, and have never yet regretted their confidence. Since then I have gone between them and the world, and smoothed their rough life in many a place. They are growing feeble now, and for a long while my wife and I have gone over there twice a week, to assist them in their work and to lessen their labors, and they have lately said to me that if I could procure a female attendant whom they could trust, and who would be contented in that lonely spot, they would be glad to secure her services, and would recompense her well. I am going to them to-day, and if Miss Bessie will venture there with me, I can promise her a safe and pleasant home so long as she needs an asylum, and a father's and mother's care, until—" He hesitated.

Arthur finished the sentence, "Until she can have a husband's." And then added, "And I may accompany you thither?"

"No, Master Arthur, it is best you shouldn't, for many reasons, the chief of which is, if Van Zandt or Van Alstyne should question you as to the runaway's asylum, you can say honestly you know not where she is." Then noticing the young man's downcast look, he added, "It is only till Christmas, you know. Once of age, she will not need to hide from them, even if she should not at once accept a new legal protector, and then you can hear from her so often. Every week I can bring letters from her, and send them to you, for travellers will be all the time passing by to the east. And now my opinion is, that the sooner we set out the better, for as yet no one knows of your arrival." And calling one of his sons he ordered three horses saddled, saying to Arthur, "You may ride with us to the edge of the marsh, and if you please, wait me there."

They were soon on the road, Bessie pale and sad at the thoughts of her strange parting and uncertain reunion, for her lover was going at once to join the American army, yet striving to wear a brave face that she might keep up his spirits, while he, though sorely out of heart, yet whispered only encouraging words to her, telling her to hope on, even in the darkest hour, for a cottage home, fair and beautiful would yet be built for her on the banks of her native river.

Too soon was the swamp reached, and, O, the agony of each, as after their unspoken farewell, the one reined in his steed under an old tree to await the farmer's return, and the other, the gentle maiden, turned into the dismal depths of that dark, miry, almost pathless morass.

"Don't try to guide the beast," said Solomon, "just give him the rein; he knows the path, for my wife has rode him through here many a time. And don't be afraid, my dear," marking how pallid grew the face that looked up to him. "You are safe, now, almost as if you were in heaven. Just cling to your saddle, and I'll soon have you in a quiet home." And they rode on. "On hard ground again," exclaimed he, as after a tortuous journey of an hour, their horses' hoofs rung on a stony road. "Courage, my dear, we shall soon be there now." And after half a mile's ride through a beautiful grove, they emerged into a little clearing which seemed to Bessie's astonished eyes like a patch of beauty dropped from heaven. In the centre stood a small log house, so overrun with clinging vines that it seemed at first but a green and flowery mound. To the south of it a little garden stretched away in natural terraces; on the east a small but luxuriant fruit orchard reared its graceful young trees, whose branches even thus early in the season hung low with their promises of a gold and crimson harvest. To the west a meadow, soft and mossy as an English lawn, sloped down to a silvery brook, whose birth-place was in the rocky hill, a little to the north, down whose steep bank its pure waters came leaping and singing, with bright rainbows sparkling ever about its fairy pathway. Back of the rustic lodge, a cool, dim, yet magnificent forest stretched away till its long aisles met the feet of hoary mountains which completely shut in the little nook from the great world beyond.

"Alight and rest awhile here," said Solomon, as leaping from his own horse, he assisted Bessie to dismount. "You will find a cool, shady arbor in the garden, with a spring rippling beside it. Go and sit there till I tell them of your coming."

Bessie did as she was told. It was a lovely spot to which she was directed, trailing roses and honeysuckles clambering in tangled masses over a frame-work woven from wild grape vines. A couch of skins, soft and white, lay piled upon one side of the little arbor, and with the welcome feeling that here she might rest, Bessie threw herself upon them, first taking off her antiquated garments and attiring herself in the simple muslin robe she had brought with her from her uncle's. Dimly shone the blue sky through the interlacing tendrils; shimmering and dancing among the restless leaves stole a few June sunbeams; soothingly did the warm south wind whisper amid the beautiful foliage, flinging sweet odors over the maiden's brow, and now and then dropping a crimson petal on her pale cheek; butterflies fluttered over the flower beds; little birds sang in mid-air, and the pure spring bubbled up in low, silvery chimes. The weary girl's senses for a while enjoyed keenly the fair surroundings, but nature, overtasked, soon pleaded so eagerly for sleep, that she closed her eyes and was soon wrapt in a slumber as profound and sweet as the one she had enjoyed when last she visited the fairy island in the Mohawk. An hour passed on undisturbed. Then footsteps drew softly near, and soon an aged man and woman look in upon her. Tears gather in their eyes as they watch the beauteous picture, and murmuring to each other, "She is like our own, and we will shelter the poor lamb," they turned and left her to sleep on.

"It was all a dream, then," whispered the young girl, as a while after she unclosed her eyes, "a fearful dream, and I am still on my own green island." And for a while she dozed in that blissful state of semi-consciousness which is so like to heaven. Gradually, however, she remembered all, and with an earnest wish to learn whether she could rest awhile in that woodland home, safe from her pursuers, she hurriedly went towards the house. An aged matron, with a face of angelic sweetness, stood in the rude doorway, and kindly motioned her to come in, and as she crossed the threshold, threw her arms about her, saying:

"I know your story. Be to us a daughter, and we will be parents." And then the aged man rose up, and folded her to his heart, saying kindly, "Our child, our daughter Bessie."

Months passed on. The summer ripened into autumn, and that, sear and brown after a brief stay of gorgeous colors, sank into the bare, white arms of winter. Winds howled dearly through the swamps, and snow drifted over the flower beds and deep into the window sills and on the porch. The voice of the brook was hushed, and the songs of the birds were lost. Lonely and desolate looked that little log cabin; but it was only upon the outside that cold and dreariness reigned. Inside there were warmth and light, and hope and joy. Christmas had come, and Bessie was free.

"Pile on the Yule log now," said the old man to Solomon the younger, who had been brought across the swamp when winter set in, to do up the hard chores, "and set it blazing brightly too, for our guests will soon be here. Ho, Bessie Van Zandt, is all ready within?"

"Yes, father," said the maiden, coming from an inner room, "will you come now?" And she led him across a dark, narrow hall, to the back room of the lodge. "Does it not look fit for a bridal?"

"Ay, darling. I did not dream that you could have fitted it up so out of those old chests. Verily, Arthur Mervale will think he has stumbled into fairy land, when after leaving that dark morass and gloomy forest, he is ushered into a scene like this." And he glanced admiringly around.

Carpets, soft and beauteous as flower gardens in June lay upon the floor, while the walls were hung with crimson drapery, gracefully looped here and there aside to give a glimpse of some sweet picture-face. The ceiling was snowy white with cloud-like lace and masses of muslin; and pendant from it in the centre, an antique lustre-lamp, wreathed with winter clover, the bright red berries contrasting finely with the dark green foliage. There was no furniture, for it was impossible to transport heavy articles over the treacherous swamp road, but the Yule logs blazing in the fireplace threw a mellow light upon crimson cushions and divans, giving to the room an air of oriental splendor.

"Ay, it is fit for a bridal, darling, and now go and array the bride, for the groom will soon be with us."

A whistle, long, loud, and yet mellow withal, rang through the lodge.

"It is he—it is Arthur," said the maiden, and half-fainted.

"Be brave now, little one. Go and dress. I promised him a bride, and in bridal garments he shall see you." And tenderly the old man led her to another room.

A robe of soft, white satin soon fell in graceful folds about the slender form, while a veil of rich old lace that had shaded an earl's daughter when she wedded, hung over the dark curls.

"Come, daughter, they are impatient," said the old man, tapping at the door, and he led her forth, and into the bridal room, where Arthur, a clergyman in robes, the faithful Solomon and his family, and the aged lady of the house were waiting.

"Make them one," said he briefly to the man of God, and ere the betrothed had shaken hands, kissed or clasped each other they were husband and wife.

Then the guests left them, and the wedded lovers for long hours enjoyed that sweet communion of the soul which a treacherous kinsman had sought to still forever. An old-fashioned English supper followed and the bride decked a Christmas tree for Solomon's little children, and danced and sung with them till their little golden heads drooped on the cushions in sound slumber. Then the elders, gathering about the hearth-stone, sat till morn was gray in the east, talking and listening.

At sunrise the guests departed, and Arthur and his bride and their two aged friends spent a happy week together. It was settled, then, as it had been partly arranged before, that Bessie remain in the Woodland Retreat, as she had named her place of refuge, till the war was ended, when they would seek a home beside the Mohawk. And for seven long years she dwelt there, seeing no one, save Solomon and his family, and her two aged friends, her solitude cheered occasionally by brief visits from her husband. In the third year of her quiet life there, a little son was given to her, whom at the old man's request she named William Glenville, nor dreamed that it was after one of England's proudest lords. With the birth of the little one, new life and beauty seemed to throng about that forest home, and when Arthur could tear himself from his army duties, and spend a few days there, it seemed as "though the days of heaven had come upon the earth."

Peace was declared at length, and freed forever, he hopefully trusted, from his epaulettes, Arthur hastened up the Mohawk to demand his wife's dowry, and to build for her the little home they had so often sketched. He found no treacherous uncle now, for a rude tombstone had marked for years the grave where Benjamin Van Zandt had found rest from his evil deeds, and close beside it slumbered the remains of his meet ally, the crafty Van Alstyn. The old family mansion was deserted save by an old crone, whom with difficulty Arthur recognized as the aunt of Bessie.

"Take it, yes, take it," said she, with manic wildness, as he at length made himself known. And hobbling into the dark, dusty garret, she drew from an old chest the title deeds to Bessie's lands, and then limping down into the dark, musty cellar, she pointed out the stone that marked the hiding place of Bessie's gold. "They stored it here, he and Rupert," she whispered hoarsely, "to have it handy for their use; but they never touched a dollar; they died, thank God, before they had the chance. And this is not all," said she, more calmly, as she sat at eventide with him in what had been Bessie's chamber. "All that I have is hers. I only ask that she let me live with her, and that she love me till I die, for O, I am so tired of living here alone—so weary with having none to care for me." And she bowed her head upon her shrivelled hands and wept.

"We shall be very lonely, Bessie, when you and little William go," said the old man of the Retreat one morning, as the happy wife read aloud a letter from her husband, telling that the cottage was nearly finished, and describing its beautiful location, with the Mohawk's waters gliding softly almost before its door and the fairy isle lying green and lovely in full sight, and a gravelled walk leading to the old trysting oak.

"But you and mother will go with us too," said Bessie. "Of course you will; hasn't Arthur planned a picturesque wing to either side of the main cottage, one for you and one for aunt? O, we shall be a happy household there!"

"Yes," said the old man, dreamily, "mother and I will go, and we will be a happy household." And he leaned upon his staff and slept as he was wont to do when weary.

They were sitting in the old rose arbor, and Bessie after a while went to the house and left him there. But as the afternoon shadows lengthened, she sent her little Willie to call him in, for she feared the October air would prove too cool for his aged limbs.

"He wont wake up, mother," said the child, tearfully, "he 'keeps saying, 'I am going.' Where is he going?" And the little one looked up inquiringly. But his mother did not hear him, she had flown to the garden, and was already holding the whitened dead upon her breast.

"I am going, going, Bessie—mother will come—we shall all be there," murmured he, and then the blanched lips were still, and one of England's mightiest lay dead.

They buried him in the edge of that dim old woodland, at the foot of an aged oak, and within sight and sound of the white waters of the hill-side falls. And ere a week had faded, they opened his grave again to the daylight, and tenderly placed upon his heart the gentle being he had so long called wife. No monument towered above their grave—he did not wish for one. But the grass grew thick and green above them; the crimson wild rose and the blue-eyed violet wreathed the grave with beauty; the sunlight, quivering through the oak leaves, threw golden stars upon it all day long, while the moonlight flecked it with silver in the night; spray from the waterfall gave it continual baptism, while the chanting of its waves was like a low sweet dirge. They rested well, the earl and his high born lady—as well as their proud ancestors who slept in the sculptured chapels of old England.

If Bessie had toiled for that aged couple through seven long years, merely for gold, well would she have felt herself repaid, when the earl's will was read, for a princely fortune in gold and gems was hers; but like a true woman, she had done it all for love, and though she prized her added wealth for the good it would let her do to suffering hundreds, she would have given it all up freely, could she but have had the dear ones back again, and dwelling with her in her fair Mohawk home.

That picturesque cottage on the banks of that beautiful river! Like some rare old painting it stands before my memory now, with the sunset arching it with golden bows and tinting the tall green trees that shadow it, with amber hues; the rose vines clustering about every casement; the soft lawn sloping to the water's edge, and dotted with fragrant flowers; and fairest of all, that little shallop, floating down the stream, with Arthur Mervale at the oars, and Bessie the gentle, saint-like wife in the prow, with a fair baby on her knees, and at her feet two sunny-headed little boys. Sweet Bessie! meekly and bravely didst thou bear life's early trials. Wife and mother! thou art crowned with glory now.

TRUE POLITENESS.

As to politeness, many have attempted to define it. I believe it is best to be known by description—definition not being able to comprise it. I would, however, venture to call it "benevolence in trifles," or the preference of others to ourselves in little daily, hourly occurrences in the commerce of life. It is a perpetual attention to the wants of those with whom we are, by which attention we either prevent or remove them. Bowing, ceremonies, formal compliments, stiff civilities, will never be politeness—that must be easy, natural, unstudied, manly, noble; and what will give this but a mind benevolent and perpetually attentive to exert that amiable disposition in trifles to all you converse and live with.
—Lord Chatham.

LOVE.

Love is blind, and lovers cannot see
The pretty follies that themselves commit.
SHAKESPEARE.

ONLY A JOKE, AFTER ALL.

BY M. A. ATHERTON.

"AND when are you to be married, Annie?" asked my friend, Lucy, as I carefully laid aside my bridal veil and wreath which I had been showing her.

There was something in the tone of her voice that struck a pang to my heart, though I knew not why, and I answered hastily, while the warm blood mounted to my cheeks:

"In two weeks from to-morrow evening, if nothing happens to prevent."

"And that there will anything happen you do not expect?" said Lucy, looking seriously into my face.

"Of course not, why should I, dear? Two weeks is not a very lengthy period, certainly, and before half that time has expired Walter is coming to Elton."

"You are sure of this?" queried Lucy.

"As sure as we can be of anything," I replied.

"Are you a prophetess? Can you peer into futurity, and tell me if there is any reason why this shall not be so?"

"I am no prophetess," sighed Lucy, "and yet—"

"And yet, what?" I demanded, impatiently, irritated by her manner.

"And yet, Walter may never come to you. If he should not?"—she did not finish the sentence, but fixed her eyes keenly upon my face.

"There are no ifs about it," I said. "What has taken possession of you that you appear so strangely?"

"I dare not tell you," was the slowly spoken reply, "but to-day I learned something dreadful."

"Dreadful? What can it be? Walter, nothing has happened to him, I am sure. Tell me, do not torture me a moment!"

"Walter—"

"What, Lucy? I shall go crazy—you'll kill me if you do not tell me!" I cried, grasping her hands and holding them firmly.

"Walter is married!"

"Married, Lucy—married—is that all? Did you think to frighten me with such an absurd story as that? Shame!" I laughed hysterically as I said this, and tears gushed freely from my eyes.

"It is true, Annie; I read it in to-day's paper, Mr. Walter Mayo to Miss—Miss—I can't think—"

"Helen Stickney?" I gasped, grasping her hands again.

"Yes, that was the name. They were married in Boston."

"Have you the paper? I cannot credit what you may have seen. I must read it—read it myself."

She drew it from her pocket and pointed to the marriage list. My eyes seemed starting from their sockets as I read. My senses were not to be trusted, it could not be, and yet, and yet there it was, plain, simple and indisputable: "Mr. Walter Mayo of Elton to Miss Helen Stickney of Boston!"

Walter Mayo—my, my Walter, married to the proud, wealthy city belle!

"Go from me, Lucy, please," I said, turning away. "Forget this—me—go!"

I staggered to a chair as she left the room. I pressed my hands to my throbbing temples. I tried to believe myself in the midst of some horrid dream, from which I should soon awaken. I would not keep back the tears; I would not suppress my wild sobs of grief; I would let them come—the dreadful spell would sooner pass away. But no, there was no change. My heart grew heavier every moment. The light that streamed in at the windows was not that of the early morning, upon which my eyes had just opened. There were sounds of busy life about the house; the children were out upon the grassy lawn. I had heard their merry shouts, and watched them at their play nearly all the long summer's afternoon. There were flowers upon my table; real flowers that my little brother had brought me in the morning, when the dew was on them. I was awake, alive! The dreadful weight on my heart and brain was a reality. Before my eyes was a proof of my wretchedness—in my hands I held it. God pity me, it was real, real!

"Mr. Walter Mayo to Miss Helen Stickney," that was all! all but my heart was breaking. My brain whirled like a maniac's. This mighty truth clasped itself about everything. It was within me, and around me—above me and beneath me. There was no leaving it, no forgetting it. There was no rest for me; constantly my heart must bear up its terrible load of grief.

"And yet it was no wonder," I thought, while the calmness of despair settled upon me; "no wonder that he should prefer the brilliant, accomplished city belle to me, me the simple, quiet, unpretending country girl! I had often heard him praise her; she was like a sister to him, he had said. Perhaps, of a sudden he had found that he loved her better than me, God only knew! But, O, it was so cruel, so hard to bear! I could not—could not live!"

"Did people ever die suddenly, when such griefs came upon them?" I wondered. If so, I believed I was dying. I rose and went to the mirror. My face was as white as death; my eyes as wild and staring as though I was wrestling with the great conqueror. Lines of purple lay about my lips, which looked as if they were frozen; frozen with such a pitiful expression of woe dagnerreotyped upon them! I clasped my icy hands over my eyes to shut out the picture which I had not strength to turn away from. My senses seemed leaving me, as with a low moan of agony going from my lips I sank helplessly upon the floor.

When I awoke to consciousness I was in my mother's room, lying upon her bed, with her dear face, anxious and tearful, bending over me. "I was dreadful sick," she said. "She had found me lying like one dead, upon the floor of my room. How long I had been there she could not tell. She had not called me at tea-time, because she thought I went out with Lucy Currier, and had not returned. The doctor said I must be quiet."

"The doctor?" I repeated, wonderingly, staring absently into her face.

"Yes, dear, the doctor—good Doctor Owens, here he is, now," and she stepped aside that I might see him, but I turned my head away, murmuring:

"Walter, Walter!"

"Do you wish to see him?" asked the good old man, pressing his cool hand upon my forehead.

"See him? O, no, no, sir!" I cried, a sudden strength coming upon me, at the thought. "I shall never see him again?"

"Well, well, you needn't dear, don't mind it," he said, soothingly, believing me delirious. "There, there!"

I sank wearily back upon my pillow, and as I did so, I heard my mother whisper my name. I listened attentively.

"Had we better telegraph to him?" she said.

"There is no particular cause for your doing so. A letter sent in the mail to-morrow morning will answer as well. I do not apprehend any serious results from this attack. Do as you please, however."

"I guess we'll send to-night, then. Walter can come then in the first train to-morrow," answered my father.

"Don't, don't send for him," I cried, springing wildly up. "If you love me, do not let him know that I am ill. I shall be better soon. Do not look at me so, I am not delirious; I know what I am saying—don't send for him!"

"Why not?" asked my mother.

"Because, because," I faltered, "I cannot tell you why!"

"What is it, child?" queried my father.

"Walter will never come here again for me; he is—"

"What?"

"He is married to some one else! I read it in to-day's paper!" I said.

"To-day's paper?" repeated my mother.

"Yes, it is in my room, go for it!"

The paper was found, and the evidence of Walter's perfidy read by each member of the family, before the wretched truth could be realized, then a blank silence followed, and my mother came to my bedside, and put her dear arms lovingly about me, and said, if all others failed, she should always remain true; that she should rather suffer from his fickleness a thousand times over, than bear up under his guilt, and that it was all right, all for the best, even though my heart broke under the burden which bore down upon it.

How from my inmost soul I blessed that mother for the comforting words she spoke to me, and while I nestled closely in her arms, like a frightened, grieved child, and felt her warm tears upon my cheeks, her tender kisses upon my lips, through my sorrow, a little vein of joy found its way, and I thanked God for my mother—for my mother's love!

In a few days I was up and about the house. The pride that had been numbed by my first shock of sorrow, took up life again and came faithfully to my aid. I put a seal upon my lips. Upon them should linger no regrets; play no words of passionate tenderness; tarry no names which had once been uttered with so much of gladness. My heart should prison all its griefs, though in their rebellion, it were torn and broken. Pride should be the stern sentinel which I would set to watch over it. Pride the sexton which should bury from the eyes of the world my woes; the mutilated corpses of my once brilliant hopes. The world should have no tombstones to look upon, and say, that in such a place my dead was lying; I, and I only must know the silent resting-place.

And thus the days went on, till the time set for Walter's coming was at hand. The story of his marriage had spread rapidly through the village. Every gossip was busy with the rare piece of news. If I went upon the street, I was watched as eagerly as though I were a condemned criminal, or a wild, ferocious animal, that was bent upon some fatal mischief. Some said that I was most heart-broken; others that I was nearly insane, and others still, that I had settled away into a sort of stupor from which I should never be roused; that in all human probability I should not live but a short time. God knows, I prayed that the last might be so, that every day I asked earnestly never to see the light of another; the bridal robes laid away so carefully might be my shroud, at the time I had thought I should become a blessed, happy wife.

The day on which Walter was to come dawned at last. I knew, I expected that it would be a wretched one to me, and I shuddered when its light broke clear and rosy in at my windows. O, how everything mocked me, on that morning! The mist rose up like a fragrant breath from the lowlands at the first warm kiss of the sun, and lay like a white mantle at the feet of the sweet, green hills. The fields stretched away, glistening in the sunlight, as though their mantles were studded with costly jewels; and the birds hymned out their praises, rich and clear upon the morning air. In all this glory how wretchedly, how wickedly I cursed the very fate that bade me look upon it—live to see it.

I put on my bonnet and shawl and wandered out into the woods, where no human voice could reach my ear, and then when the silence grew more terrible than the busy, bustling sounds of human life, I went back to the village again; wearily towards home. I went past the depot. A train of cars had just that moment come in. I had promised to meet Walter there, at that very hour. I turned back, I knew not why; perhaps I thought to cheat myself for a moment into the belief that I should meet him as I had promised; that the past week was a myth, a dream. As I did so, a well-known voice sounded upon my ear. I turned quickly around, the blood receding rapidly from my brow, cheeks and lips. Merciful Heavens! Walter Mayo was standing directly before me, with a beautiful, showily dressed woman leaning on his arm!

"O, if I could but be away from this spot!" I thought, as a terrible faintness came over me. "Was pride frightened from her post again? Should I give up there, sink before all those cold, criticizing eyes? No, no!" and with a strong effort I moved on, directly past them. As I did so, Walter's gaze fell upon me.

"Ah, there is Annie," he said, "this way, Helen," and going towards me he held out his hand.

I drew back. A rapid, angry light shot from my eyes. My lips quivered, my whole frame trembled with emotion. I would not bear his insults, and every word that he might speak to me, after the great wrong he had done, was, indeed, an insult. I looked disdainfully at his proffered hand and turned away.

"Why, Annie, what is the matter, you are looking as white as death?" he exclaimed, laying his hand upon my arm. "Why do you turn away so—what does this mean?"

O, how the tenderness of his voice went down to my heart, and plead with the stern sentinel pride! How it roused my quiet dead—my dead that I had placed in their graves—the cold, icy graves of forgetfulness!

"And why do you dare speak to me, sir?" I said, in a voice hoarse with passion. "I have no words to waste upon you!"

"Annie, Annie, I cannot believe my senses—what is the meaning of this?"

"Your heart is baser than I thought, if you do not know the meaning. Let me go, I have nothing to say to you. I cannot wish you and your beautiful bride joy, even, for in my heart I have only curses, curses for you! that is all."

"Bride, bride, Annie, are you mad? I have no bride!"

I laughed his words to scorn as he uttered them. "Do not add another falsehood to the pyramid that you have already raised," I said. "And yet, what could be the use of such a denial," I thought, as the words died away upon my lips.

"You shall not go, until you explain yourself," he said, grasping my hand, firmly, as I turned away again. "Speak, Helen, tell her that I have no bride, and never hoped to have, but her!"

"But," I began, hesitatingly, my voice growing strange and hollow, "but what did that mean—your marriage—in the paper?"

"My marriage—is it possible—did that cursed joke reach you? And have you been crediting it all this while?"

"Is it not true? O, Walter, Walter!"

"Sure, Annie, as I hope for heaven, it is not! Some malicious person, I know not who, sent the marriage to the paper, and the first I knew of it was by the report which began to circulate among Helen's and my friends. O, if I had only known of this! and still I ought to have known how it would have been, my poor, dear Annie! You are faint—see, Helen, how white she is growing!" And taking me in his arms as though I had been an infant, he bore me rapidly to a carriage, holding me tenderly to his breast, while passionate regrets and words of endearment fell from his lips.

Ah, what is the use to prolong my story, reader. We were married at the appointed time—and I have no wish to die, out of all the blessed happiness that surrounds me.

THE PRETTY APPLE GIRL.

BY M. H. MACNAMARA.

The lily was not whiter
 Than the pallor of her face;
 The stars were not brighter
 Than the eyes wherein I trace
 A look of pensive sadness,
 As if life were ebbing low—
 Of a soul unused to gladness,
 Of a heart attuned to woe!

Her form was thin and graceful,
 And her hair was darkly brown;
 Her step was slow and faltering,
 As she wandered through the town;
 Of every stranger asking,
 With smile and voice to charm:
 "Will you purchase of the apples
 In the basket on my arm?"

Some would pause to pity her,
 And note her faltering step;
 Pretty maidens passed her by,
 And in silent sadness wept,
 To think that one so beautiful—
 They knew that she was good—
 Should toil thus in mid winter
 For a scanty livelihood.
 She labored for a helpless man,
 And old and blind was he;
 The grief that gnawed his daughter's heart,
 The old man could not see.

He could not see her pale, wan face,
 Nor her lustre-fading eye—
 He little knew that suffering heart
 Was soon about to die!
 The angels came one summer eve,
 And sang around her bed;
 And when the morning brightly dawned,
 The suffering child was dead!

THE MOSQUITO QUESTION.

BY FREDERICK WARD SAUNDERS.

"Now, do you mean to say, Jinx, that you really have so much trouble with mosquitoes as you try to make us believe?" inquired my friend Johannes Taurus, as we sat at the breakfast table of our boarding house.

"Confound you, can you look me in the face and say that same to me?" I asked, turning fiercely upon him.

Johannes laughed, and well he might laugh, for my features presented a curious study for a painter—or a glacier either. I am particularly sensitive to the bite of insects, a mosquito commonly leaving a lump rather smaller than a door knob, and on the night before, the wretched little trumpeters, having carried my mosquito bars by assault, proceeded to carry me in the same manner. I generally sleep on my right side, with half my face buried in the pillow, and my nose gracefully twisted towards the left. It was while lying in this unprotected position that the cowardly villains found me and basely shed my blood. One look in the glass in the morning did my business for me, as far as my temper was concerned, for that day at least.

O what a sight was there, my countrymen! Did you ever? No I never! The right side of my face still retained the look of serene beauty which is natural to it, but the other, the unprotected side, baffles description, as writers say when they intend to describe the aforesaid baffler. My "damask cheek" was swollen up even with the nasal promontory, my forehead was so remarkably protuberant that a phrenologist who would have set down Webster's perceptive faculties at ten, would have placed me at ten thousand. My left eye was nearly closed and had a horrible squint; half of both lips were altogether too "pouting" even for the most sable among our colored brethren, and the whole concern was of a lovely brick color, with here and there a blotch of dark purple, and besides all the rest it itched slightly.

I was painfully conscious what wide differences of opinion my appearance would create in the minds of the various people I should encounter through the day. The pretty young lady passing on my right would wonder who that handsome young divine could be, and where he would preach next Sunday. The equally pretty girl on my left would shrink to the utmost edge of the walk to avoid that horrid man who must be a murderer or worse.

"It's very singular," persisted Johannes, maliciously, "how a few harmless insects could give you such a truly marvellous mug as you are sporting this morning—that is, supposing that your sudden deformity is really owing to them, as you say it is."

"Do you doubt my word, sir?" very fiercely indeed.

"Not at all, my dear Jinx—quite the contrary. I have always considered you a gentleman who would speak the truth upon all occasions—yes, and upon a pinch, even more."

A laugh all round the table at my expense did not tend to improve my temper, but I had sense enough to restrain my anger, for to have seriously resented what was evidently intended as a harmless joke, would—as no one could look me in the face without laughing—have been a little too absurd, so I contented myself with spluttering out: "I suppose you don't 'ave hany such hiazsects in Hengland?"

"O yes we do. But I have been thinking how very strange it is that as my room adjoins yours, I should have so little trouble with them, while you suffer so much, and here's Tompkins, too, who rooms with you; I can't detect a single blotch upon the whole vast expanse of his countenance. By the way, Jinx, you didn't get home till after twelve last night, you must have seen something of that fireman's row just below here. A blow of a fist on the side of a man's face—will—sometimes—"

Johannes paused, and gazed musingly into the depths of his coffee-cup, while the rest of the boarders quaked with merriment. This was too much for me, so fiercely swallowing the last of my steak, I hastily tossed a cup of coffee down my throat the wrong way, which choked me to such a degree that it was at least two minutes before I succeeded in catching my breath, with a great gasp, I rose from the table, knocked over my own chair, caught my foot in the skirt of a lady's dress, and with my face buried in my handkerchief choked and barked myself out of the room.

Some three hours later in the day I was seated in my office very busily engaged in scratching myself, when I walked Tompkins.

"Well, Jinks, what do you propose to do about it?" he asked, as he brought himself and the sofa together with a great flop that knocked a cloud of dust out of one or both of them.

"Be hanged if I know. The fact is, now that I've had time to think of it, I don't blame any one for raising a good laugh; I should have done the same thing myself."

"Jinx," returned Tompkins, solemnly, "I'm astonished at you. The time has been when you would scarcely have allowed yourself to breathe until you had got something handsome in train for a fellow that has set the whole table laughing at you, and you must do it now. Taint fair towards me, taint patriotic neither to let a foreigner get the better of you before the whole house, even if he is a good fellow."

"Well, to tell the truth, Tompkins, with the exception of scratching myself, I have done nothing else this morning than try to study up some smart joke to make John Bull laugh out of the other side of his mouth at breakfast, but so far I've hit upon nothing."

"Well, I have," rejoined Tom, triumphantly. "You!"

"Yes, me; and the slickest of it is, that I will place him in the identical fix you were in yourself, only worse. What say you to employing a gang of skeeters to walk into him to-night?"

"Pooh, what a fool you are! How do you propose to raise the varmints? I fancy I see an advertisement—"Notice to skeeters out of employ. Wanted, one thousand able-bodied skeeters, to whom good—"

"Don't trouble yourself about that part of it," returned Tompkins, rubbing his claws in great glee at the prospect of a good practical joke, "the skeeters are already hired, and waiting for business."

"But how the deuce—"

"Just what I am going to tell you. You know back of our store is an old rain water cistern, that hasn't been used since the Cochituate water was brought in. Well, this morning I was poking about the yard, when I happened to knock the cover off the cistern, and up flew a dozen or more skeeters right in my face. No sooner did I see them than it put me in mind of something I couldn't think of. So I slammed the cover back again to keep them in until I could make up my mind why the sight of them had struck me so very curiously. First they naturally reminded me of your scrape; then I imagined how you would have felt in that cistern; then I thought how any other fellow would feel, and I had my plan at once. Running back to the store, I got three or four pieces of netting about a yard square. One of these I makes into a sort of bag and holds it down snug to the opening of the cistern. Soon as the cover was off, the skeeters sees the light and begins to rise by dozens and twenties till the bag was as full as it ought to be, with a proper regard to the comfort of the animals themselves; then I ties a string round the neck of the bag, and did the same with three others, and there they all are, humming and buzzing away like so many beehives' nests. And I tell you they are skeeters—monsters. I'll bet any man a dollar many of them will weigh a pound!"

"A pound—pooh!"

"By jingo, it's a fact. You needn't take my word for it, but just see for yourself. There's a dollar I'll lose on it."

I began to fear that Tompkins was getting a little out, and I looked at him with a good deal of anxiety. He never appeared more serious.

"Do you mean to say that what you have said about their weight is true?" I asked, speaking very slowly and decidedly.

"True as the Bible, and you must be insane to doubt it. I said many of them would weigh a pound. I didn't say a few would, but many, a great many; probably about the number there is in the cistern." And Tompkins forthwith went into fits upon the sofa, in his delight at having put an old sell upon me.

The apartment occupied by Tompkins and myself is a large room with two long windows, looking upon a pleasant, shaded court, each window being provided with a small balcony, just big enough for two chairs and four legs, but neither communicating with the other except by passing through the room. The room adjoining ours—which was originally intended for the sleeping-room to the parlor which we occupy—has the same arrangement of window and balcony, though only one of each; there is a door between the rooms, which can be opened at any time by removing a chest of drawers and turning a key—both on our side of the door. This small, adjoining room is occupied by Johannes Taurus.

As the red-faced centre of the solar system was scratching the many-colored western clouds together into a nest, preparatory to setting, Tompkins and myself were effecting a felonious entrance into the apartment of our victim. The chest of drawers was easily removed, the key turned, the door opened, and there we were. After some deliberation as to where to place our live stock, we decided upon the cupboard beneath the wash-stand, as being the place in which he would be least likely to look, and also the nearest to our door, where we could most easily control the movements of our winged allies.

Accordingly the three bags of concentrated venom were deposited in this receptacle, each bag having two strings attached to its mouth, for the purpose of opening them at pleasure; the strings then led through gimlet holes in the back of the sink, and so beneath the door leading to our room. All being now arranged, we had only to wait the progress of events. As the company in the parlor were separating for the night, Johannes remarked with sarcastic pleasantry:

"I hope, my dear Jinx, the mosquitoes wont trouble you as much as usual to night."

"Thank you," replied Jinx, "I hope you may not be annoyed by them either."

"Pooh!" said Johannes, contemptuously. "The idea of making such a fuss about such insignificant creatures. If I never have any greater annoyance than they can produce, I assure you I shall not be deprived of any sleep, or bore any one with complaints." And Johannes glanced loftily around at the assembled ladies, who in their turn glanced admiringly at the stoical hero.

Jinx meekly acknowledged that some men possessed an infinitely greater amount of courage and endurance than he did himself, and quietly retired.

About half past eleven a heavy step ascended the stairs and entered our friend's apartment. We applied our ears to the door. First one boot and then another were tossed across the floor; then the various buttons rattled as they were thrown across the backs of chairs; then the bed squeaked with the weight of a person who had evidently thrown himself upon the outside, as the night was intensely sultry—then a variety of gasps, yawns, grunts and snorts gradually died away into long, regular breathing.

"Now for it," whispered Tompkins, taking hold of one of the strings and gently drawing it toward him. It was a moment of intense anxiety. The string might break, the bag not open, or some unforeseen accident occur. I plastered my ear up snug against the key-hole and held my breath. Presently there was a slight buzzing of a few mosquitoes as they found their way out of the bag, every moment increasing in number and variety of note, until we were satisfied the bag was empty. We now watched the symptoms of the patient intently. For a few moments he snored in happy unconsciousness; then came uneasy breathing, and rolling from side to side; then sudden drawing up of the feet, and still more sudden kicking of them out again, accompanied with a vigorous rubbing of the hands and arms, slapping of the forehead, etc., and at length a waking up, a mild swear, and the chunk of two heels as they struck the floor.

"What in Satan's name is all this?" we heard him mutter, as he danced about the floor, alternately scratching himself with spiteful claws and slapping his hands together in the vain attempt to slaughter some of his assailants. The bright light of the full moon streaming into the long window revealed the number of the intruders, and the thought seemed to occur to him to drive them out, for seizing a broom-brush in one hand and a towel in the other, he began flourishing about, "shooing" and "scatting" in the most absurd manner, fondly imagining they would take the hint and depart through the window. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that they did nothing of the sort. On the contrary, taking advantage of the useless exposure of his person while flourishing his implements of warfare, they settled upon his back, legs, neck and face in such vast and hungry numbers that he could endure it no longer. Dropping his towel and brush, with a howl of pain he dove into bed and under the clothes, head and all, as I judged by the deep, stifled breathing which was more like sobbing.

"He can't go that long," said I to Tompkins, who was choking with suppressed laughter. "It's too everlasting hot to sleep long with the head under a blanket, and the varmints will bite through a sheet as well as if it wasn't there. Stand by to open another bag when 'he turns out.'

I had taken the precaution to bar our own windows with netting, so that if the mosquitoes should take a notion to go out of his window, they couldn't get in at ours. So, taking my pipe and pushing out the netting like a bow window over the balcony, I seated myself comfortably to watch proceedings. As I had anticipated, our friend didn't stand it long under the bed-clothes; at the end of three minutes he came to his feet with a bounce, dragging all the clothes with him.

"O lord, I can't stand this—this beats the D—D—Dutch," he moaned, as he pranced frantically about the room, slapping and spanking himself with the greatest animosity.

"Give him another dose," I whispered to Tompkins.

The fresh volley of shrill trumpeting that reached the ear showed that Tompkins's lines were in good working order, while the continuous scratch, scratch, scratch, dig, dig, dig; slapping, spanking, moaning, swearing and gritting of teeth, showed equally that the mosquitoes themselves were in good working order.

"Are you up, Johannes?" I asked, in a careless tone, as he approached his window in one of his paroxysms.

"Eh, hullo!" he exclaimed, poking his head out and seeing me upon the balcony. "Why, are you up, too—and dressed? What's the matter? Can't you sleep? Are you troubled with—"

"No, not at present—are you?"

"Yes—that is—no. There are a few in here I believe. But do you mean to say there are none in your room?" he asked, in a tone that had something of despair.

"There was one here, a while ago."

"One!" he muttered, gritting his teeth, and dodging back to give a sly cut at his legs.

"But I drove him out," I continued. "Possibly he may have come into your room, if there are any there."

"I think he has done so—yes, I think he must have come in here," he said, alternately chafing his ankle with the opposite foot with such celerity that he appeared to be dancing a jig.

"I would have killed him if I could," I continued. "But then I suppose you don't mind if he did come in, they trouble you so little, you know."

"O no, I don't care—I rather like 'em," he answered, bitterly, as he made another attempt to effect a lodgement in his room, but almost instantly returned, wrapped up in a long dressing-gown that reached to his heels, and seated himself on his balcony, a strong detachment of the enemy following him out, and harassing his rear.

"I don't wonder, Johannes, that you have but little inclination to sleep on such a night as this," I began, in my most sentimental tone. "What could be more truly heavenly than the lovely scene before us? All nature is in repose; there is not a zephyr to shake the diamond dew-drop from its setting of emerald, not a sound reaches the ear, save that of distant music, not even an insect is astir—" (Johannes swallowed a moan and gritted his teeth). "At such a moment," I continued, "it is almost impossible to realize that evil passions, suffering or pain can have an existence on this beautiful earth—"

At this moment the moon, which, for a little while had been behind a cloud, came out in full splendor, showing up our friend to great advantage. There he sat, in nothing but shirt and dressing-gown, his body bent half double, his feet fiddling against his ankles and shins incessantly, his hands in full play, keeping his head, neck and each other free from the enemy, his usually red face now a perfect flame, swollen and streaming with perspiration, while an immense flock of mosquitoes formed a perfect halo round his head—for all the world like the rays about the setting sun—the expression of his countenance being precisely that of a malignant demon with an excruciating stomach ache.

This picture, in connection with the sentimental speech I was trying to get off, was too much for Tompkins, who, stuffing his handkerchief into his mouth and holding his ribs with both hands, laid down upon the carpet and rolled in an agony of silent side ache.

"Yes, my dear Johannes," I went on to say, "it is the delicious repose and quiet of the hour that we enjoy so much, the total absence of all disagreeable—"

"By thunder and lightning, I've got it!" yelled Johannes, springing full six feet from the balcony, and in at his window at the same time. The next minute we heard the sound of running waters!

Johannes Taurus, Esquire, passed the trifling remainder of the night in a bath-tub, and it was the talk of the whole house next day, that he was having his window fitted with one of the finest mosquito bars ever seen.

Every rose has its thorns; you never find a woman without pins and needles.—Jerrold.

THE NUN.

BY ANNA M. BATES.

Saintly kneeling down to pray,
In the convent old and gray,
From the sounds of life away.
In no 'broidered raiment fine,
In her locks no jewels shine,
And no flowers luxuriant twine.
But her robe of serge is gray,
And her dark hair put away,
As she kneels alone to pray.

Why is she in girlhood's bloom
Buried in this living tomb—
In this narrow convent's gloom?—
Round the nuns are kneeling low,
Still as statues made of snow;
But they do not heed or know—
How in thought she sees once more
Sisters round the cottage door,
With the vine leaves shadowed o'er,
And the mother's meek, brown eyes,
And the father's mournful sighs
Now before her vision rise.
All because the fairest flower
Is transplanted from their bower,
To the gloomy convent tower.

Sorrowful she thinks how late
Did she paint the votary's state
Heavenly, beautiful and great;
When she thought the cloister's gloom,
And the convent's quiet room
Dearer than the smiles of home.
Broken now the rosy spell,
And the organ's lofty swell
To her is a mournful knell.
Kneeling by the altar stone,
Does she count, with many a groan,
Her beads over one by one.

Ah, poor heart, that bleeding lies 'Neath this heavy sacrifice,
Only God may lift thine eyes.
Only He can make it light,
How the book and priestly rite
Are not worship in his sight.
No more doth His presence stay,
In the convent still and gray,
Than within the world's great fray.
There he strengthens feeble hands,
There he helps the tolling bands,
Wearied on life's burning sands.
And from out their thorny ways,
As in heaven's eternal days,
Rises up His prayer of praise!

LIFE SCENES AND SHADOWS.

BY MRS. AGNES L. CRUIKSHANK.

It was on a sunny day in June, between ten and fifteen years ago, that I stood among a group of young girls, speaking farewell words to each other on leaving our boarding school, a few miles distant from the British metropolis. For three years we twelve had dwelt together as one family, little or no change having taken place in our home during that period. But the time had come when we must part, and if there were some hearts almost overflowing with joy, it was not unmingled with pain at the approaching separation from well known and long loved companions. Perhaps of the whole group I myself was the saddest, for the past three years had been the happiest of my life, and my prospects in the future were far from brilliant. Without a relative in the world nearer than a cousin of my father's, who was a man in years, it is not wonderful that I had bestowed on some of these fair girls the long-smothered affection of a heart which had always pined for a sister's love.

Among our number were two American girls, one from sunny France, and one who had inherited from an Italian mother the peculiar characteristics of that people; the rest-like myself were English born, and with no remarkable traits to distinguish them from other pretty, gentle natives of our Saxon soil. Of the party, my favorites had always been the two beautiful Americans, nor was I alone in my choice. The strong will of Olivia Hallett, united to her great personal loveliness, had unanimously gained for her the title of queen among us; while her friend Ruth Clements, almost equally beautiful, and far more lovable, was looked on as a sister by most of the girls.

Olivia had a clear, transparent complexion, heavy, dark hair and glorious eyes; nothing could be more beautiful than the tint on her cheeks, or the rosebud freshness of her crimson lips; yet those eyes could flash and the full lips curl in a deeper scorn than I ever have beheld on a face since. It was little wonder that our good governess felt such anxious solicitude about the future fate of her most gifted, graceful and wealthy pupil, since there was no mother to keep loving guard over the young heiress.

Ruth Clements was very different in appearance, and I thought even more beautiful than her companion; but it was the beauty of a true, pure spirit, looking forth from deep blue eyes, eyes in which every thought and feeling were mirrored so clearly that all hearts were involuntarily drawn towards her. Ruth also was motherless (this was one circumstance which doubtless made so strong a sympathy between us three), but no one, looking on her pure white brow, and calm, resolved face, ever felt any fears for her future. Troubles might come, but you felt that under that beautiful form was hidden a spirit equal to combat life's hardest struggles.

As both these girls were liberally supplied with money, and had wardrobes far surpassing any that their companions possessed, I need scarcely say that during the first year at school there was both envy and ill-feeling, but in a community like that, time causes each one to find their own level, and it came at last that no one questioned their right to superiority.

I had so often heard Ruth and Olivia speak of their homes in New York, that when the time came for parting it needed an effort to repress a feeling of envy at their happiness. Before me loomed up the gloomy prospect of the old London house where I had passed my joyless childhood, and where for aught I knew the remainder of my life was to be spent; while they read and re-read the letters which told of the fond impatience of two loving fathers to clasp their absent children to their hearts.

"I shall write to you as soon as I reach home, dear Maggie," Ruth said, "and you must not fail to be a punctual correspondent. As I am going to be papa's housekeeper, I shall have much to tell you about; and you must also tell me how you enjoy yourself in that old haunted house you tell me of."

"And I shall write just as soon as I get a lover," Olivia exclaimed, "and as that will probably occur on board the ship, you may look for speedy news."

We laughed as we always did at her gay speeches, and just then Giulia, the Italian girl, whispered that some one was coming through the garden.

"It is old Sally, the fortune teller," Olivia exclaimed. "Now that we have so good an opportunity let us see what the future has in store for us. I for one am ready to learn my fate." And she went dancing down the walk, and turned into the arbor whither the stranger had betaken herself out of sight of our governess' windows.

"I am afraid our Mrs. M—— would not like this if she knew," Ruth said, as we all came hurrying after our leader.

"But she need not know, and besides, we are all free to-day, you know," Olivia said, and laid her little white hand in the old woman's sun-browned palm.

More than one rosy cheek turned pale as we saw the strange look the sybil cast on the beautiful girl, but Olivia bore it without flinching.

"You are a brave one," she said, and a sarcastic sneer added to the disagreeable expression of her features. "A brave and a handsome one; but your pride will be laid low, my fair lady, and your beauty shall bring nothing but desolation and death. The curse of more than one blighted heart shall be upon you, and gray hairs shall go down in sorrow to the grave for your sake." She flung away the little hand with an expression of loathing, and turned to Ruth, who stood next. "Will you too try the fates?" she asked, with a hateful smile.

But Ruth drew back. "I do not think it is right, it is very wicked to foretell such things. I am content to wait for time to tell me my fate."

But others were more curious, and one after another, the old woman held each trembling hand until it came to my turn. I had not resolution enough to follow Ruth's example, so allowed her to examine my palm also.

"You have had sorrow, and you will have more," she said. "Others will owe their happiness to you, but whether you share that happiness will depend on yourself; twice your fate will be in your own hands, and once you will decide right, and once wrong." I tried to draw away my hand, but she held it firmly and pointed to Olivia. "You like her—avoid her as you would a pestilence; sorrow and suffering attend her, and her blighting influence will fall on many."

We gave her money and she went away, leaving a strange pain in more than one young, innocent heart. In spite of Olivia's attempts to appear indifferent, I could plainly see that she was affected by the old hag's persistent prophecies of evil, but that evening the lady and gentleman under whose protection they were to return to America, came for them, and in a few hours we were all on our journeys home.

It was very bitter to me, this parting from Ruth Clements, and every time my eye fell on the little bouquet of violets and geranium leaves she had placed in my hand, my tears fell afresh. But Mr. Morton's early old servant was seated beside me, and I would not give him any more occasion for surprise than I could help. I thought with something like comfort of Ruth's last words, "Bear it as well as you can, dear Maggie, until you are your own mistress, and then come to me." And I resolved if such a time ever did come, I would go to her.

Arrived at home (the old dingy brick house looked more gloomy than ever), I met my guardian at the very entrance, just going out. He greeted me coldly, as had ever been his custom, held open the parlor door while I walked in, and then went away to leave me in silence and loneliness to mourn for the loss of my pleasant companions, and indulge in no very pleasing anticipations for the future. Everything in the old house looked just the same, save that the two servants had grown more feeble, and a younger woman had come to aid the housekeeper; the man leaned a trifle more heavily on his oaken stick, and both were more sullen and reserved — I had noticed in the momentary glance I took of my guardian that his hair was several shades lighter, almost white in fact, that he had grown thinner, and the lines in his face deeper, he looked ten years older instead of three. The book he had been reading lay open on the table, a mystical German work, wherein the author labored to prove that all things came by chance in this world. I read a few pages and laid it down in disgust; my education had not been solely with a view to accomplishments, and one of my first convictions had been in direct opposition to this hopeless doctrine. I saw the hand of the Creator in all his works, and believed that he ruled the destinies of his creatures with infinite wisdom. I wondered not at the unhappy looks of my guardian, if the distrustful, unsatisfying belief of this German philosopher were his.

More than ever did I regret our pleasant school home where the simple, unaffected piety of our governess had made religion desirable even to gay, young, girlish hearts. The unthankful, gloomy atmosphere of Mr. Morton's house affected both my health and spirits, but I tried all in my power to cheer and comfort him, the unhappy owner of all that might make people glad, yet unsmiling, sorrowful, going down to the grave with neither wife nor child to comfort or console him for the trouble which all might see was daily bending down that gray head and feeble form. At times he appeared pleased with my attentions, listening while I read aloud or played on the piano, but soon the mood would change, and he relapsed into the old gloom, treating me with a harshness for which I could find no possible reason, and which caused me many bitter hours. As he stood in the place of a parent, I showed him a child's duty; but it was simply duty, I could neither love nor reverence a man so inconsistent and so unkind.

Mr. Morton and I sat at the breakfast table one morning, silent as usual, but with more outward show of comfort than we generally enjoyed. The pleasant August sun came through the uncurtained window, and gilded our dull room into actual brightness, the table looked well with its snowy damask and old fashioned china and silver; my birds sang merrily in the sunshine, and Mr. Morton's favorite cat—the only object that he ever showed any fondness for—came purring beside him, and jumped up in his lap.

The servant came in with letters, two for his master and one for me; I opened mine joyfully, for I recognized Ruth Clements's beautiful hand in the superscription. It was a long letter, good and kind like herself; I had not half read it through when Mr. Morton, having glanced at his own, asked me who it was from. I answered, "One of my schoolmates," and went on reading. He took up the envelope, and as his eyes fell on the postmark, uttered an exclamation that made me let fall the paper I held in my hand.

"New York! Do you dare to tell me you correspond with any one in New York? You deceiving girl, what tempted you to do this?"

I was shocked at his words, still more at his angry looks, but summoned courage to tell him that this was the first letter I had received, and that I had never written any myself.

He cooled down a little at this. "Well, see to it that you never write any."

"But I must answer this," I said in alarm. "My friend expects a reply, and as I like her best of all my acquaintances, I don't want to offend her."

The expression of Mr. Morton's face was awful. "Write to her at your peril," he said in a voice of suppressed passion. "You don't know what it is to cross me, and you had better not learn. I tell you to have nothing more to do with this girl and her letters; do you hear?"

I was dreadfully terrified, I thought the man was crazy, but there was no refusing to obey, so with an aching heart I promised that I would not send an answer or communicate in any way with any one in America. He appeared satisfied with this, and soon after went out, leaving me to go to my room and finish Ruth's letter, and also to speculate on this new mystery. What possible harm could it do him or any one else for me to write to this dear girl? But then I remembered that it was the place and not the person he had objected to, he had not even heard my correspondent's name. All my conjectures appeared unsatisfactory, and I gave it up at last, and turned once more to my letter.

Ruth said they had arrived safely, without any remarkable adventure, save that Olivia had fulfilled her prophecy, and secured a lover on board the ship. She bade me not expect a letter from Olivia very soon, and I thought alluded rather sadly to the volatile girl's habits, and the old woman's predictions about her. She spoke of the beautiful home her father had made her mistress of, the pleasant friends he had introduced to her, and at his bidding sent many kind regards. How gladly would I have answered this friendly epistle, and how unreasonable appeared the prohibition Mr. Morton had pronounced; more than once I was tempted to write secretly, but then I never had disobeyed him, and my promise, I would not break that. So days, weeks and months passed on, and I heard no more from my friends over the water.

The affair of the letter was never more mentioned between us, I kept my disappointment to myself, and he gradually recovered from his anger. Perhaps my feelings were softened towards him by noticing daily how he failed, how old and worn and haggard he looked, and how deep a grief seemed to devour him night and day. Many an hour I heard him pacing back and forth in his room long after midnight, and puzzled myself in a thousand vague conjectures as to the cause of this silent misery. The explanation came most unexpectedly. I was sitting up later than common, musing on the contents of another letter which I had received from Ruth, in which the dear girl spoke of her first as having been lost, she having waited a whole year without receiving an answer. Olivia was married to a good man, "too good for her I am afraid," so she wrote. "She does not value him as she ought, but rejoices in the conquest of his wealth. They were acquainted but a few weeks previous to the wedding, not long enough for her to understand him, certainly not long enough for him to learn her heart. She came to see me a few days ago to request that I would keep a miniature for her, the likeness of a young man whose attentions before her marriage were much commented on. She said she was afraid Mr. N—— might find it and make trouble. I asked her to destroy it or to let me do so, both which propositions she declined, and having myself a high esteem for Mr. N——, and dislike for young Shaffer's conduct and principles, I positively refused to have anything to do with the matter. Old Mr. Hallet idolizes Olivia; he is very wealthy, and her dowry was magnificent; nothing she asks of him is ever refused. I hope she will do well, for sorrow coming to her would kill her old father." From some quiet hints in another part of Ruth's letter, I understood that she too was about to be married.

I determined on answering this letter and was calculating on the chances of getting Mr. Morton's permission to do so, when my door opened, and the old housekeeper came in, looking very pale and in most extraordinary dishabille. I could see that the hand holding the light trembled violently, and her voice was unsteady with emotion.

"The master is very ill, Miss Morton, and wants to see you immediately."

I laid Ruth's letter away, threw a shawl about me and followed her out into the dark gallery. I had never entered Mr. Morton's room in my life, and my first sensation was unmingled astonishment, it was so different from what I had expected. That it had once been in the possession of a lady I saw at a glance; but the next moment my eye fell on the deathlike countenance of my guardian, and I forgot all else in anxiety.

"Where is the doctor, have you not sent for help?" I asked the old woman.

"No, the master would not consent," she replied, and shook her head dolefully.

"But he is very ill, he will die without help."

He opened his eyes and looked at me. "With or without help," he murmured, "so do not let me be disturbed." He motioned to the housekeeper to set down the glass of mixture she held, and leave the room, then bade me take a seat near the sofa on which he was reclining. There was a great change in his manner, a gentleness I had never seen before, a plaintive tone that went to my heart. "Do not tremble," he said, kindly, "I have wished for death too long to feel any terrors now. I have but a few hours to live, and I have still much to do. My life has been wretched. O, so wretched; none may know, save those who like myself seek happiness in revenge, how keen are the pangs of remorse." He closed his eyes and sighed heavily, and my tears fell fast, for I remembered that he was my only relative, all the friend I had in the world. "Poor child," he said, "I have not deserved that you should weep for me, I have not deserved sympathy from any one; but listen to my story. I was born in this old house, I and your father and mother. Your father's father, old Abel Morton, was the head of the family, and when the news came that my father had fallen in battle, he gave my mother a home here, and when she too died, I became as his own son. He was a good man, a kind, warmhearted man, who grieved for sorrows of any kind, more than all for the sorrows of parents. In his young days he had been guardian to an orphan girl; she married, her husband spent her property and drank himself to death in something over a year; the poor, broken-hearted creature came back to her old home, and here her child was born. Margaret, that child was your mother, but for many years she knew no other parents than Abel Morton and his gentle wife. They were very loving to the little child, for the green grass waved over the graves of three of their own, and out of a blooming family one only had been spared to them, the delicate little boy, Nathan. I was ten years older than my cousin Nathan, and being very strong and stout, went ahead of him in all things, until at last I came to look with scorn on his frail beauty, and the evidences of his feeble strength. My high spirits made me a favorite with all save little Margaret Morrison, who from earliest infancy shrank from my advances, and clung with trusting fondness to Nathan or his equally feeble but favorite companion, Harry Allison. In my heart I hated the two boys for the attentions they required and received, but as years passed on, and we all grew up, my hatred and jealousy became madness. Your mother was very lovely, and good as she was beautiful. I would have died for one of the smiles and caresses she lavished on the others, and yet though kind, she ever shrank from me as of old. Draw back that screen," he said, and obeying, I beheld the portrait of a young girl, very fair and beautiful to look at, and evidently as loving and sweet tempered as she was handsome. The picture hung directly opposite to him. "Many a long hour have I spent alone with that image of her I loved so well; it never frowned upon me, never cursed me."

He covered his face and was silent for a few minutes, while I gazed with strange, new feelings on the portrait of my mother, the mother I had never seen in life.

"You will have time enough to admire that, Margaret," Mr. Morton said; "it is yours now—all that was hers shall now be yours—but I must hasten." I gave him a mouthful of the mixture, and he went on. "When your mother was seventeen, I saw that young Allison loved her, and I fancied that she returned his affection. He was a clerk in one of Abel Morton's offices, loved and trusted as his own son, and his home was almost as much with us as in his own father's house. I hated him because Margaret Morrison smiled on him; I vowed she should never be his, that I would crush him for daring to cross my path, and I kept my oath. I saw the day when he was turned out of Abel Morton's house with cruel reproaches, when his name was in all men's mouths, and they called him gambler, spendthrift, forger. He was innocent; I knew he was innocent, and laughed at his sorrow, laughed until I saw Margaret weeping in Nathan's arms. I believed she loved Harry, and that Nathan was their confidant. I heard him tell her not to despair, that Harry was going to New York, and doubtless in a few months the mystery would be cleared up, and he would return. She kissed him for his kind words, and I gnashed my teeth and swore another oath. It was not long until I learned that he had got a situation, his open, manly countenance and gentlemanly manners had stood him in lieu of a better recommendation; and with fiendish satisfaction I wrote to his employers a few lines sufficient to blast his every prospect. How I gloried in the knowledge that he could not return, that perhaps he might never come back to claim his bride, and in the meantime I asked her to love me, and learned to my horror that it was Nathan and not Allison to whom she was betrothed. They married when she was twenty, married and lived here, here in this house, while I roamed the world like a second Cain. For several years I kept myself acquainted with Allison's movements, not that I repented—for had he not dared to love the woman I worshipped?—but I wished to make sure that he did not clear himself from the imputation I had cast on his name. It followed him like his shadow or a dying curse. He married for love, no doubt, but the evil report was on his path, and poverty and sorrow attended their steps. I have not heard tidings of them now for fifteen years; they may be dead for aught I know, but they had children, some of whom are doubtless living. The remembrance of my cruelty has long haunted me, nor can I die in peace until reparation is in some measure made. My revenge has been my own punishment, and the word 'America' has long sounded in my ears like a curse. Will you, the last of our name and race, promise to repair this wickedness of mine as far as lies in your power? Will you, as soon as I am dead, go to America, and with the instructions you will find in my desk, seek out Allison and his family, and pay to them the sum named in my will. It was the fortune your grandfather intended to leave him, and year by year I have added the interest to it and laid it away, as a sacred deposit for him."

Mr. Morton ceased, and I promised in all things to obey his last wishes: some other instructions he gave me, and then I left him to recover from the fatigue of our conversation. He was weaker and worse the next day, and grew gradually more feeble until the end of a week, when he died. I had called in a physician, an old friend of my guardian's, and he took charge of the funeral, and the necessary business, but all matters relating to the property were left in the hands of Mr. Morton's lawyer, a very kind and worthy man. I found all the papers precisely as he had said, save that here and there were chance sheets where he had seemingly written down the feelings of the moment, and very dreadful his sensations must have been at times. There was an old diary of five and twenty years before, wherein his agony at his cousin's marriage to Margaret Morrison was most touchingly described. Then allusion was made to the loss of my brothers and sisters, then my father's death, and lastly my mother's. His comments on these were sometimes bitter, sometimes tender; after my mother's death he wrote,

"Now farewell hope, fear, joy and sorrow, henceforth life is a blank." And here the book ended.

In his will comfortable provision had been made for the two servants, and a few, trifling bequests to old friends, principally books and pictures; the old house and the Morton property was mine; but the legacy of old Abel Morton to his godson, Henry Allison, with its accumulated interest had become an immense sum. Three weeks after Mr. Morton's death I left England, not even answering Ruth's letter before my departure. I left the housekeeper and her companion in charge of the old London house, and all business matters in the hands of the lawyer.

I started on my voyage with the joy of a released prisoner, even more, for was not mine a mission of mercy and justice? I cannot describe the thrill of delight with which I remembered that I was my own mistress, that no human being could henceforth control my actions, or bind me again to the solitude and silence I abhorred. I changed very much in these few weeks, even my dress, about which I had ever been indifferent, now became an object of care. I wore simply black, but it was of the finest material, no crape, only black silk, plain black silk, but the richest prices I could find in London. Of my voyage I shall say nothing, I have so many other things to tell.

"Mrs. N—— is not at home, ma'am," said the well-behaved lady's maid. "She has gone to sit again for her picture."

"Where is that? I will go and find her, if you know the address."

The girl handed me a card with the name, "Henry Gray, artist," and the address. In a few minutes we drove up to the door, rather a shabby looking place, I thought, but then artists are so peculiar. I sent away the carriage, and went in and up three flight of stairs, and then again was the name, "Henry Gray."

A very delicate looking individual, dressed in the extreme of foppishness, opened the door, and to my inquiry bade me walk in. I found Olivia in a magnificent dress, sitting for her likeness in an inner room. She welcomed me with extreme cordiality, kissed me again and again, introduced the young gentleman as Mr. Shaffer, and bade the artist lay aside paints and pencils for that time. He came from behind the easel now, and I had an opportunity of observing him, perhaps the contrast to Shaffer made the impression stronger, but I thought I had never beheld a more perfect face and figure in my life. He was very pale, and even I, little skilled in reading human faces, could see the traces of a deep and abiding sorrow in that youthful and beautiful countenance. It made my cheek burn to see how patronizingly Olivia treated this gentlemanly artist, while showing all kindness and attention to the miserable little fop who fluttered round her like a butterfly. The two talked apart while Mr. Gray allowed me to inspect some of his most beautiful pictures, and I could not but see that there was something in Olivia's manner decidedly wrong. When we were in the carriage, driving to her home, Shaffer took some most unwarrantable liberties, pulling off her glove, placing his arm on the cushions round her waist, and when she took off a magnificent ring, and desired him to keep it until she should sit again, he kissed her hand with most disgusting affectation. We left him a few doors from her home, and I felt positively relieved when he was gone; doubtless she read my feelings, for she begged me not to mind him. "Poor fellow, he is so loving and so kind I can't be angry with him." With all my heart I wished myself away, but it was too late to repent now, and in a few minutes more we were at home, and welcomed by Mr. N——.

There was no company, and I had a good opportunity to converse with my host on the business uppermost in my mind. I had been directed to him as one who knew the Allison, and who would be likely to give me all necessary information. I showed him the papers, and he entered eagerly into my feelings on the subject, but said that for many years he had lost sight of the family. He believed they had removed to the country, and he promised me all possible assistance in my search. The conversation then turned on the artist, Mr. Gray, and I learned that there was a great mystery about him, no one knew his origin, but he was talented and poor, working for a living, yet avoiding all publicity.

"I have tried to befriend him in many ways," Mr. N—— said, "but his pride rejects all assistance save in the way of business. His is a rare and beautiful character, and it must have been a cruel sorrow to cloud his whole life."

Olivia interrupted us. "Don't talk any more about the gloomy fellow, he makes me nervous with his great black eyes, and woebegone look, but tell me something more about that property. What a silly girl you are, Maggie, to give it up, I should keep it myself, and who is there to say anything about it? I am sure I should never go looking up those Allison folks if I was you."

I thought Mr. N—— looked grieved at her speech, and he soon after went away, and Olivia and I went in the carriage to see Ruth Clements.

"Miss Morton, allow me to introduce you to Miss Clements, soon to be Mrs. Allanson," my gay companion said, as we entered Ruth's chamber, where several dressmakers were at work, and the dear girl herself in the act of selecting some laces which had been sent for her to choose from.

She welcomed me with the old sisterly warmth, and led the way to another room; but there was constraint in the greeting she gave Olivia.

"What a foolish child you are, Ruth, to go worrying yourself to death with all these dresses and things in the house! Why did you not send them all to Madame M——, as I did?"

"Yes, and pay twelve dollars for the making of a gingham morning wrapper, as you did. I have better uses for my money, Olivia."

Mrs. N—— looked slightly confused. "Well, I must own it was extravagance, but then you know that is madame's price, no matter what the material is, and I could not endure all the fitting and fuss at home."

"Well, I prefer to have my things made under my own eye; besides, it gives these girls a profitable month's work, instead of increasing that proud French woman's gains."

"Well, please yourself—please yourself; only don't look so sad and sorrowful. Somebody's been telling you some more nonsense about my little flirtations, I know."

Ruth looked almost angry. "The whole town is talking about you, Olivia, and your nonsensical encouragement of that young Shaffer."

"Well, what can I do? You would not have me stay at home and play propriety with N——, would you? And when I go out, he can't always go with me, and I don't want to go alone—and so—and so—"

"And so you are willing to endanger your own name, and your husband's happiness, and all for an idle whim."

"There, that's sermon enough for one day. I have a thousand calls to make; take care of little Maggie there, and see that you set us all an example when you marry Allanson."

After she was gone, Ruth and I sat down to one of those delightful gossip long-parted friends find so sweet. I was charmed with her father's house, and all her surroundings appeared so elegant, so comfortable, I told her I wondered she could dream of leaving so kind a parent.

"You will understand the reason, Maggie, when you meet the right one."

"And have you met the right one, Ruth?"

"I do indeed believe so, Maggie," she answered, earnestly, while a sweet flush dyed her cheek. I believed so too, when I met her handsome, gentlemanly betrothed.

With the privilege of an old friend, I was allowed to inspect the wedding preparations, from the well-packed trunks of snowy household linen to the costly satin dress and rich veil, and the case of jewels which had been re-set for the bride. Among these, I found Mr. Allanson's likeness in a locket, and a watch—a birthday gift of her father's—both magnificent articles; but such things had a value in Ruth's eyes beyond their actual worth.

"What would you do," I asked her, "if by any sudden change you should become poor? You have been used to such an excess of luxury all your life, it would be very hard."

"Not so hard as you think, Maggie; you don't know what a housekeeper I am. Even at the risk of spoiling my hands, I have learned the mysteries of cooking, and I believe I could conduct my household affairs tolerably well, though at present I shall have no chance to test my powers, Mr. Allanson preferring to have an experienced woman to superintend affairs—in fact, an old housekeeper of his mother's. But there is no harm in knowing."

I thought not; and could not enough admire the beautiful, sensible girl who had passed unspoiled through so much indulgence and so many temptations.

Mr. Allanson came the following morning for Ruth and me to visit Gray's studio; he wished to have one of his best portraits done, to leave with Mr. Clements. We found Olivia and young Shaffer there, as before; and neither Ruth nor her lover spoke to him. There was true friendliness in their greeting to the artist, whom they both knew; and Allanson said to me, as Mr. N—— had done, "a most mysterious history, but a true gentleman." How I longed to penetrate the cause of that sadness so visible in his face, sounding in every tone, but there was no approaching one so reserved.

"Mr. N—— has been telling me that sad story of Allison's," said Mr. Allanson, as we walked round the room and looked at the pictures. "I feel interested in it, for my father was one of the partners in the house where he first got employment, and where Mr. Morton sent the letter warning them that he was a bad character. My father would have kept him, for he was interested in the handsome lad; but the senior partner knew more of the world, or loved his money better, or had better reasons for taking the warning—at all events, he discharged him at once. Several years afterward, my father got a letter from an unknown correspondent, begging the loan of a hundred dollars to enable a man to keep his family from starving. He immediately recognized Allison's writing, and enclosed a bill for five hundred, telling him it was a free gift, and proffering more if it was needed. Since then, we have had no tidings of him; but we learned that every time when he had succeeded in getting employment, the same report was forwarded to crush him down. I was but a boy when this happened; but I remember it perfectly, and also hearing my father say he believed it to be the work of an enemy, and that Allison was innocent."

As Mr. Allanson finished speaking, I heard a low moan beside me, and there, half-leaning against the wall, stood the young artist—his face deathly pale, his lips livid, and he apparently fainting. Allanson sprang forward and caught him in his arms, while I hastened to get a glass of water from a stand near by. There was also a little confusion near the door; and as Mr. N—— came in one way, young Shaffer made a hasty exit by another. Of course we all gathered round to keep away all the air we could, as people always do when one faints. But Mr. Gray did not faint. He said it was merely a weakness he was subject to—he would be better in a little while; but I saw that he was unhappy and wished us away, and I hurried the party all I could.

It was evident that N—— had suspected his wife of having other company, and he now stood talking with more than his ordinary kindness, as if to make amends for injustice.

The next morning Allanson came to us in great trouble; the artist had vanished, given up his rooms and gone off, telling his landlady that he was compelled to leave New York. I must confess I was deeply disappointed, as I had a hope that I might be able to fathom the strange mystery which all said surrounded him; more than that, he had been very kind to me in the two short visits I had paid to the study—had shown me the paintings; and spoken of his art with very little of the reserve he kept up with the others. However he was gone, and I kept my sorrow to myself.

Ruth's wedding took place, and as I was her bridesmaid, they insisted that I should accompany them on the wedding tour. We journeyed for several weeks, and at last rested in a beautiful and romantic settlement in Northern New York. Allanson had passed a vacation here in his youth, and day after day he led Ruth and me over hill and dale, rock and rivulet, to his favorite haunts, until we were often glad to rest in any place where anything was to be had to eat.

We came most unexpectedly one day on a beautiful little farm-house, half buried in shrubbery, with fine cultivated fields at the back, and a river in front. Great elms shaded the entrance, and there was an air of comfort around the whole place most inviting. Ruth clapped her hands with joy; for we had torn our dresses, wet our feet, eaten all our provisions, and sadly needed recruiting. Allanson hurried us along, and in a few minutes we stood in the vine-covered doorway, and were welcomed into the neat kitchen by an elderly gentleman and his very good looking and well dressed wife. They were evidently people who had not lived always in that wilderness, and we were soon at home in their company, and partaking with a relish of the dame's sugar cakes and home-made currant wine. Allanson admired the place, and the old gentleman looked gratified; yet in a few minutes he sighed heavily.

"You say truly that this is a place to be happy in; yet even here we have troubles. Our only child came home to us very ill a few weeks ago, and is still unable to leave his room; so you see it is not all sunshine even with us."

"But he ought to have better advice than you can procure in these parts," Allanson said.

The father sighed again, as he answered:

"Poor fellow! no physician can help him! his trouble is solely in the mind."

We rose to leave, after an hour's rest passed in pleasant conversation. As Allanson took the old gentleman's hand, he said:

"Your life has doubtless been a happy one—free from care and sorrow; may we all be able to say as much, when our years are as many."

Ruth came next. "I should like to have the names of our kind entertainers to remember when I am far away."

The old man held her hand and looked down into her pretty face. "It is many years since I have spoken my own name, dear lady, nor can I speak it now. It is a sad name, bringing sorrow and suffering to all who bear it—for your husband is wrong in thinking I have known nothing of sorrow. Few on earth, I hope, have endured miseries like mine; accused of a crime never committed, hunted from my own country, driven to despair in this, all my attempts to obtain a livelihood crushed, my little ones perishing of hunger and cold, forced at last to ask charity of a stranger—think you I have not seen trouble? But that one man had mercy, and from him I received enough to make this home for our old days, and here our efforts have been prospered."

The old man paused, with the tears in his eyes, and I saw strange emotion in Allanson's face. "What was the name of that man, you speak of?" he asked, hoarsely.

"He is dead; I saw his death in the papers several years ago; but I pray that his children may be blessed for his sake. His name was Allanson."

There was silence for an instant, and then I heard our companion speak again.

"This is a strange meeting, a wonderful meeting, for you are Mr. Allison, and I am that man's son, and here is one who for months has searched in vain for you or your family, the last of the race to whom you owe your sufferings."

The old man laid his hand on my shoulder, and turned my face to the light. "Margaret Morrison's child!" he said: and turned away as if unable to talk further. I was too agitated to speak, nor did I comprehend all that Allanson was explaining to the old man; that it was pleasant, was soon evident, for he came and took my hands in his and blessed me.

"Not for my own sake, for it is all one to me now; not for my wife's sake, for she is willing to share good or ill with me in the future, as in the past; but for my boy, my noble, high spirited boy, am I thankful that this stain has left our name."

We were a strange, excited group standing there in the old kitchen—Ruth and Mr. Allison sobbing, the tears running down the old man's face, Allanson and I too happy to weep, yet deeply affected—when the door slowly opened, and a pale face and two dark eyes looked in upon us. I knew him instantly; but not until Allanson exclaimed, "Why, Harry Gray, how came you here?" did I find voice to utter a similar exclamation.

I draw a veil over the scene of the next two hours. The Allison's would not allow us to leave them that night, and day dawned ere we sought our couches. On informing them of the large fortune which now awaited them, Mr. Allison refused to touch it.

"I have more here than I shall ever need; money is of no use to me in this wilderness. Harry can take it and fulfil his intention of travelling."

But Harry had no idea of travelling just then, at least not alone; and he also had some scruples about taking all this money which he considered was my right. The matter was discussed for several weeks, and then Harry had an answer.

"I cannot take it, Margaret; I have no right to deprive you of such a property."

"And I have no right to it," I answered.

"Then the only way is to share it together; will you consent to that?"

And finding that there was no other way to satisfy his scruples, I consented; and in all these long years, I have never repented my decision.

Next year, Harry and I left our pleasant English home, to pay a long-promised visit to our friends in America; and warm was the welcome we received from the good Allanson and his beautiful Ruth. We found their home a perfect little paradise, and they surrounded by all the comforts and luxuries money and good taste can procure. It was night when we arrived, and Ruth took me to her nursery to see her treasures—her twin daughters sleeping sweetly in their little bed. I kissed the dimpled fingers, the rosy lips, even the bright curls scattered on the pillows, and wondered not at Ruth's fondness for her darlings.

"But who are these?" I asked, as my eye fell on two more sleeping innocents, whose darker hair told of a different parentage. Ruth bent with equal fondness over these, as she answered:

"They are Olivia's—the little N—s. The mother left them two years ago, when you were at the Isle of France; poor N— followed her and her companion to Paris, where they fought and N. was killed. He had given me the children before he left, and her poor broken-hearted old father left Mr. Allanson their guardian. He died from shame and sorrow at his child's disgrace, about six months ago."

How often have I thought of that old fortune-teller's prophecy so many years ago, and wondered by what mysterious means she could have so exactly foretold the fate of our young companion!

AIR AND SUNSHINE ON LONGEVITY.

A writer in one of the medical magazines argues that the more out-door air and cheery sunshine a man can use, the longer he will live. Go along any of the fashionable streets of New York, says the writer, and you will see no less than three, and often six distinct contrivances to keep out sunshine and gladness. First, the Venetian shutter on the outside; second, the close shutter on the inside; third, the blind which is moved by rollers; then, there are lace curtains, the damask or other material, etc. In the train comes the exclusion of external air by means of double sash, and a variety of patent contrivances to keep out any little stray whiff of air from entering from the bottom, sides and tops of doors and windows. At this rate, we shall dwindle into Lilliputs, if we do not die off sooner.

THE WIND.

Ye too, ye winds! that now begin to blow,
With boisterous sweep, I raise my voice to you.
Where are your stores, ye powerful beings! say,
Where your aerial magazines reserved,
To swell the brooding terrors of the storm?
In what far distant region of the sky,
Hushed in deep silence, sleep ye when 'tis calm?
THOMSON.

TO MY FATHER.

BY LENA LYLE.

Though other friends around thee spring,
And other hearts are knit to thine,
Though other voices round thee sing,
O wilt thou not remember mine?
Though others gently o'er thee bend,
To chase away affliction's tear,
Though other tears with thine may blend,
O, wilt thou not still hold me dear?

Though others may have wealth to proffer,
Give not to them thy love alone,
Though I have nought but love to offer,
And a true heart to be thy throne!
O, still amid thy joy and gladness,
That heart would fain rejoice with thee;
And in each hour of grief and sadness,
Still sympathizing it will be.

Then O, though weary miles divide us,
Let not our hearts be parted too;
But mild the storms that may betide us,
Still let our love be warm and true;
Then O, when other friends, caressing,
Are near to win fond words from thee,
When thy full heart pours forth its blessing,
O wilt thou not remember me?

THE FOSTER BROTHERS.

BY HENRY BURTON.

So often have stories like the following, or with some of its features, been fabricated to meet the appetite for fiction, that the only pardon I can claim for this, is its truth and the interest that must attach to it as being of recent occurrence, or, at least recently come to light.

A noble family at Vienna, to whom was born a very lovely and promising infant, entrusted it to a young woman who, before her marriage, had been a servant in the family. It was the first child that blessed the parents, who had been married several years, and the mother, a frail, delicate woman, was unable to nurse it. It was thought a very fortunate circumstance, that Louise Lollard, their old and attached servant, who had been brought up with the young baroness from her childhood, should have a young child so near the age of hers, and should be able to nurse them both without detriment to either. The Baron Stralheim was about to take a long journey, and was anxious that his wife should accompany him, to ensure the restoration of her health; and after the tenderest caresses to her child, and innumerable charges to Louise, she departed with her husband.

The little cottage in the suburbs of Vienna was in such a healthy location, that the baron renounced an idea which suggested itself, of removing Louise with her husband and children to the town house. They had luxuries enough in the healthy, bracing air, the clear, sparkling water, fresh fruits and vegetables, and above all, the sweet, new milk which had now become the main part of the diet of little Eugene, to decide a sensible parent of the superiority of a suburban residence.

Louise Lollard was a good, easy sort of woman—never taking much pains, but getting along with very little trouble. She had no trials, because she would not have them. She cast them off when they touched her, as one casts off a spider or wasp, and they never stung her. The children were never scolded, and she had just that "wholesome neglect" of them which is sure to bring forward smart, self-reliant children. Her own child and the baron's looked enough alike to be twin brothers; the same soft, blue eyes, and light, curling hair, and the same pure, delicate skin appertaining to both. They were sweet children both of them; and a stranger watching them for a whole day, would not be able to say which was the child of aristocratic parents, or which was the peasant's offspring. As month went on after month, Louise often heard from the travellers with fresh charges respecting the care of their child. They had been detained in several ways, but always agreeably so; and they found travelling so pleasant, and so favorable to the health of the baroness, that, although longing to see Eugene, they should proceed further.

Louise wrote every circumstance respecting her charge. She kept a daily journal of his progress, where every new action, every tooth which he exhibited, and his first attempts at walking or speech were duly chronicled, as such extraordinary matters should be, and the record forwarded to the delighted parents.

One day, Louise, somewhat carelessly, left both the children in the room, while she went into the garden to get some fruit. She was returning, when a scream from the house, followed by another, made her drop her basket and run hastily in. Poor little Eugene had fallen from a table on which he had climbed, and when Paul Lollard returned with a surgeon, the latter announced that the child's arm was broken.

Louise was roused from her usual state of unconcern; for, to add to her discomfort, Paul had placed in her hand a letter which told her that the baron and baroness were already on their way to Vienna, and would probably be with their child almost or quite as soon as the letter could reach Louise. To the baron's letter, his wife had added a few words of postscript in which she said :

"I tremble, Louise, when I think of my child. You must show him to me well, handsome and strong. Indeed I know you will ; for, of course, you have written me the truth about Eugene."

What could she do ? Another hour, another moment, and the baroness might arrive ; and here lay her worshipped child, hurt, perhaps deformed for life, and moaning in his pain like a wounded lamb.

She had not a moment in which to discuss the rapid thought that rose to her mind. She called Paul out into the passage, and whispered a few words in his ear, and before he had time to answer, the carriage was at the door, and Louise with her own beautiful child in her arms, was welcoming her mistress home. But the lady scarcely saw her, she was pressing so rapidly towards the child.

"And this sweet little angel is mine ?" she asked, as she took the bright, rosy boy from Louise. "Yes, you have well fulfilled your charge. Look, my husband, is he not perfect ?" And with the glad, bright tears of motherly affection in her eyes, she beckoned her husband to enter the house with her.

"But who is ill here, Louise ?" as an indescribable odor assailed her on entering the room. "Good Heaven ! your child ill, Louise ? Is it contagious ?"

The surgeon explained, and the baroness gave all the sympathy she could to the poor little sufferer, but was almost wholly wrapt in the contemplation of her child's beauty. Little Paul, unconscious of the part he was playing in the drama, was amusing himself with the watch and chain which the baroness had given him to hold, while Eugene was holding out his arms to Louise, who knelt beside him while she told the lady of the accident.

"Thank God, it was not Eugene ! I should have died. How could you be so careless ?"

Louise had a day of torture ; but like all things it had an end ; and she saw the baron's carriage drive away, and heard the words linger on her ear—"we shall come every day."

That night she held consultation with Paul. There was no chance now to substitute the right child again. They would be disgraced forever, and long before Eugene could compete with the other child, the baroness would have cast them off as unfaithful and treacherous. Louise loved her dearly. They had gone too far to retract, and the little Paul must henceforth be the heir of Straleheim.

It was not without bitter remorse and real sorrow that Louise saw how she had erred ; and once or twice she declared that she must reveal all to the mother, but Paul forbade her.

"You suggested it, and I agreed to it," said he, "and now it must be so. It will be impossible to pass Eugene upon her now—and after all, the peasant boy is the best looking of the two."

Louise glanced her eye upon the two little beds—one where Eugene lay with a suffering expression contracting his little brow, and the other, where the curly head and rose bright cheeks of her own darling reminded her of the infant John in the little chapel of our lady of Loretto, where Louise went daily.

"It will be hard to give him up," she murmured, "and why should I ? No, I will tell her all."

"Look here, Louise," said Paul Lollard, almost fiercely, "you have brought this upon yourself, and must abide by the consequences. We should be ruined at once, if it were discovered. I have no fancy to banish myself from this place, and our own child will be, after all, the gainer by the deception. Learn to look at it in that light, and you will soon grow easy and careless as ever."

"My glorious boy—my beautiful !" These were the words of the baroness, as she alighted the next day at the cottage where the unconscious little impostor was holding out his hands to welcome her at the door. "Look at him, husband. One would know that he was of noble birth, by the very turn of his graceful little head !"

Louise caught the words, and exulted a little as she heard them, but grew sad and troubled in a moment.

"You look unhappy, Louise," said the baroness. "O, I remember, your child is ill. How is the poor little fellow ? O, do be careful of my treasure, and not let him fall. I would take him home while the child is suffering, only that I do not dare to remove him at this time of year. Next winter, sweet love, you will be all my own !" And she pressed her lips to the boy's rosy cheek, and was lost in the certainty of a mother's joy over the child which she holds in her arms.

Eugene recovered, and soon was as buoyant and bright as his playmate. Often and often did Louise long to hear the baroness planning another journey.

"If she would go away and stay even a few weeks, I could easily manage to have her take the true child again."

But the noble pair had had enough of travel, and they were now anxious only to have the little heir at home, and settle down to a quiet life. And when the Austrian winter set in, the peasant child was taken to the home of the Straleheims, and every one dilated upon the aristocratic bearing of the embryo baron.

"You are not kind, Louise," the baroness often said to the heart-stricken woman, who now always looked sad and thoughtful. "Eugene will forget you if you do not come oftener to see us. Indeed, I must have you with me more, lest I should not carry out the plans which have operated so favorably for him under your roof. I wish we could persuade you and your husband to enter into our service through the winter."

And Louise told this to Paul, and he said, "why not?" And so they went; but it was a winter of agony to Louise, and in the spring she hastened back with the child whom she was depriving of its rights. Even Lollard repented, when he saw how the inward fever of her soul was consuming her frame. But death did not come to relieve her, although she prayed for it daily.

While the guilty and the suffering are praying for the death that will not come, the "shadow feared of man" hovers over the dwellings of the rich and powerful, to whom he comes unwelcomed. Baron Straleheim was dying; and the wife and son, the latter now grown into manhood, were hanging in silent agony. With a last whispered blessing on both, he fell asleep. Louise and her son were bidden to the stately funeral, and followed with the servants.

The next year Louise was also made a widow. Paul had not been very kind to her, and she suffered less by the change than she would had she not been so absorbed in her terrible secret. That was the undying sorrow that covered and overwhelmed all others. She ceased, after this to visit the baroness at all; but sometimes, indeed often, the Straleheim carriage could be seen standing at her cottage door, and the young baron and his mother would spend hours with the desolate woman. They sought to comfort and console her, although they knew it was a hidden grief and not Paul's death that bowed her to the earth. Had they but known that it affected them so nearly!

The young baron was much attached to his foster-brother, and procured him a commission in the Austrian army. Louise had strained every nerve to have him well educated, and the reputed Paul Lollard would not have suffered in comparison with the reputed baron in point of talent or gentlemanly appearance. When he went to join his regiment Louise lived on alone. Soon after his departure the young baron was married to a beautiful and noble lady, and it was not long ere he brought her to see his foster-mother. The confession which had so long trembled on her tongue, was now checked, as she thought, forever; for who could be cruel enough to blight the happiness of these two noble beings? Besides, the true Eugene was in even an enviable position. She had partly eased the gnawings of conscience by raising him as high as she could.

"My poor Louise!" said the baroness, as she reached the cottage, being hastily summoned to the sick bed of her humble friend. "What can I do for you?"

"Is your son here?" asked Louise.

"Yes—he and Marguerite accompanied me. Will you see them?"

"Yes; and he will be here soon, too. He has been sent for."

She seldom called him her son, and rarely said "Paul" if she could avoid it.

A horse's feet were heard close at the little window, and the young soldier entered.

"Mother, dearest mother, you are ill! Was it for this I was summoned?" And his noble and expressive face and ready tears betrayed his sorrow. The baroness explained that there was no immediate danger, and Louise did not tell him to the contrary, although she felt that her hours were numbered. The baroness talked of the young soldier to Louise, while he had gone to speak to the baron and his young wife.

"What a noble, distinguished looking man he has become, Louise. He is to be my care, remember, my friend, whether you leave him or not. I claim the privilege of furthering his interests."

Louise groaned deeply. "Are you all here?" she asked. "I want you all to listen to me. Forgive me if you can, for I have injured you all."

They thought her only wandering; but with a strength born of desperation, she made an effort to rise. Sitting up in her bed, with the red glow of fever upon her cheek, she told her story to the astonished listeners, who sat silent and breathless to the end, when she sank back exhausted upon the pillow.

Each looked at the rest with speechless amazement at the revelation from her lips. But a mightier spirit than human pomp or state could evoke, was dealing his work in that room. Louise was gasping for breath. The two young men pressed toward the bed, and kneeling down, each took a hand of the dying woman, and each said, softly, "my mother!" At that sound, a heavenly peace came over the face, and when the dim eyes again opened, the baroness had knelt between them, with her arms about them both.

"They shall both be my sons, Louise," said the forgiving and magnanimous woman. "Marguerite, my love, you are not Baroness Straleheim, but, thank Heaven, you are the wife of a good and noble man, and I am still your mother. We will talk of this when Louise has rested."

"My mother is resting now," said the young soldier, as he rose from his knees. And it was even as he had said. She had gone alike from human blame and human forgiveness.

Baron no longer, Paul Lollard has joined the army which his foster-brother left to assume his baronial rights. Eugene bears him no enmity for bearing his title so long, and the baroness cannot decide which of her sons is dearest to her heart.

THE GROWTH OF A SHIP.

This piece of ship anatomy was, a few months since the home of singing birds; and its green leaves danced and twinkled to their music. And now, though stripped and seeming dead, it will live a gallant life; it will feel a noble sympathy with giant being; it will pulsate to the billow; it will be a portion of a living ship; a beautiful and fearful thing, full-breasted, robed in flowing snow; a thing where grace and mightiness marry, and are indivisibly harmonized. The growth of a ship! The growth of a human thing! Why, it is alike. The earth and sky—all the elements have done their ministering, nursing the primal germ. And then, as the babe is to the man, so is the timber to the craft. The child becomes an honest trader or a sinful thief. The oak swims as a merchant, or plunders as a buccaneer.—Douglas Jerrold.

VALUE OF TRUTH.

The duties which we owe to our own moral being are the ground and condition of all other duties: and to set our nature at strife with itself for a good purpose implies the same sort of prudence as a priest of Diana would have manifested, who should have proposed to dig up the celebrated charcoal foundations of the mighty Temple of Ephesus, in order to furnish fuel for the burnt offerings on its altars. Truth, virtue, and happiness may be distinguished from each other, but cannot be divided; they subsist by a mutual co-inherence, which gives a shadow of divinity even to our human nature.—Coleridge.

UNBELIEVERS.

They eat
Their daily bread, and draw the breath of heaven
Without or thought or thanks; heaven's roof, to them,
Is but a painted ceiling hung with lamps,
No more, that lights them to their purposes.
They wander loose about; they nothing see,
Themselves except, and creatures like themselves,
Short-lived, short-sighted, impotent to save.
So on their dissolute spirits, soon or late,
Destruction cometh, like an armed man,
Or like a dream of murder in the night,
Withering their mental faculties, and breaking
The bones of all their pride.

CHARLES LAMB.

OUR SUNBEAM.

BY HARRIET N. HAYENS.

Who with smiles the livelong day
Chases grief and care away?
Who with sunshine fills the room,
Sweeps away its shades and gloom?
Tinges with a golden light,
Meanest objects, till as bright
As his own pure soul they gleam,
Through the darkness of the scene?
It is our Eddie, darling boy,
Our sunbeam, hope, and pride, and joy.

Who with gladness and surprise,
Opens wide his violet eyes,
At the story of the love
Which provides a home above?
And in childhood's broken tone,
Sweetly lisp, "I'm doin' home
To the sky where fowers grow;"
In a voice subdued and low?
It is an angel strayed from bliss,
To bless with love a world like this.

Who with pure, unselfish love
Gives a glimpse of heaven above?
Loving everything on earth,
High or low whate'er the birth;
Till we see a beauty rare,
In the words—"to have a care
To become as little children,
If we wish to enter heaven,"
And learn like them to trust and love,
If we like them would reign above.

Two precious words the answer give,
Our sunbeam—long may he yet live,
To shed his light on all around;
And when on earth no more he's found,
May the new sparkling ray above,
Reveal the depth of Christ's dear love.
And when our work on earth is o'er,
And we at last have reached the shore
Where angels dwell, this is our prayer,
To see "our sunbeam" shining there.

THE FLOWER OF EL HAMET'S HAREM:

—OR,—

OUR SUPERCARGO'S TURKISH BRIDE.

BY CAPT. JAMES F. ALGORN.

OUR vessel was lying at anchor in Constantinople harbor, awaiting an order to proceed to the isles of the Ægean Sea, for a homeward cargo, when one day, just as the bell struck eight, at noon, a shore boat came off, and 'Silas Harding, our supercargo, sprang from her stern sheets, as she touched the side, mounting the gangway ladder two steps at a time, and bounding from the rail, demanded as soon as his feet touched deck:

"Where's the mate?"

"Here, at your service, Si!" rejoined I, as I confronted him, being within six feet of the spot on which he landed. "What's up? You look as if a whole troop of Janisaries were at your feet."

"Do I though?" demanded he, grasping my arm; adding: "But never mind my appearance now! Come into the cabin—I've something to tell you; besides, I've a great favor to ask."

"O ho! That accounts for your presence at once," said I, laughing, as I followed him into the cabin; adding, as I seated myself: "Where on earth have you been, and what have you found among the Turks so intensely interesting, as to deprive us not only of your society, but even of a friendly visit from you for a whole month? Come, give an account of yourself! I confess I'm somewhat curious to learn the manner in which you have passed your time ashore. I couldn't exist a tenth part of the period, where racks and bowstrings are in such demand."

"Have done, Frank, for heaven's sake!" he exclaimed, at length. "I've but little time to spare, and must make the most of it. I'm in love—"

"Whew! The deuce ye are!" interrupted I.

"There, there! Do stop, will you?"

"Certainly; only tell me how you happened to catch the disease, and what kind of a subject you caught the infection from. None of those harem beauties, I hope; because, if that's the case, you'd better make your will, for you're booked for a sack and a plunge in the Bosphorus as sure as shooting!"

"O, incorrigible!" he exclaimed. "Do listen!" And he re-seated himself, having risen impatiently and taken a turn fore and aft the cabin, while I had the floor, as they say in Congress.

"Mum's the word! Heave ahead!" rejoined I, tipping my chair back, and assuming an attitude of attention, when he resumed:

"You know our old consignee, Achemet El Hamet?"

I nodded my assent.

"And also that I took up my quarters with him, at his request?"

Again I bowed.

"Well, I'm over head and ears in love with his daughter Meta, and having won hers in return, am resolved to make her mine, in spite of all opposition. Old Achemet has smelt the rat, and I have reason to believe causes every motion of mine to be watched, although to all appearance as frank and open-hearted as ever. You know what the Turks are, when once offended; they'd smile in your face, while encircling your neck with the bowstring. I think it quite likely the old wretch intends me harm, if I remain much longer in his power, to which belief you can attribute this demand upon your friendship."

"To do what?"

"Escape his vengeance!"

"I should think that was easy enough. Why return to his house? You're safe enough here."

"Yes, but have I not told you I must have Meta? I couldn't live without her, and I am certain she would not survive my desertion. No, no! I'd risk a hundred lives to win her! Will you aid me?"

"What! to carry her off? Hold on, my dear fellow. Do you know what you propose? Why, 'twould subject us both to the bastinado, if not to the bowstring!"

"If caught in the act, you should say. I know it. I have counted all the cost, and am well assured that I can succeed, with your aid. If you refuse it, however, I can't blame you; but rest assured, I shall not be deterred from my purpose thereby. No, I will make the attempt alone, even if I perish therein."

"That's right, Si! I like your pluck. But give me a history of the affaire d'amour, and mind, I do not refuse you assistance, should it prove to be deserving such risk. Those Turkish ladies are a class of beings I don't understand, and if all is true that I have read concerning them, I should be very loth to undergo the slightest risk on behalf of any of them."

"You know as much of them as do I, Meta excepted, whose purity of mind and thought I'd answer for with my life. Did you know her as I do, Frank, woman-hater as you are, you could not fail to be interested in her."

"How in heaven's name did you form her acquaintance?" demanded I. "Do the Turks in reality permit the ladies of their harems more liberty than we have been led to believe?"

"Not a whit, Frank, so far as I can judge. Achemet has no less than three wives and three or four daughters; yet of none have I had so much as a glimpse, save Meta. I had been on shore a week, when feeling indisposed one day, I declined accompanying El Hamet to the city, preferring to lounge on a divan within the walls of his luxurious villa, to exposure to the sun and the fatigue of riding to and from the city—a distance of some five miles. After dinner, feeling much better, I sought the garden, taking with me a book, and entering an arbor in one of the angles of the garden furthest from the house, was soon devouring its pages with avidity."

"How long I had been wrapt therein, I cannot tell, when a slight scream and the rustle of garments at the entrance of the arbor, aroused me. Looking up, I was amazed at the vision of loveliness which met my gaze in the person of Meta, who stood, as it were, spell bound, gazing at the strange intruder, as she deemed me, while the sound of hurried footsteps betrayed the flight of her companion, whose scream and quick retreat had aroused me.

"For over a minute we remained immovable—her gaze betraying amazement, curiosity and fear, while mine spoke volumes of admiration for the angelic creature who had thus suddenly burst upon my vision in a land where women are, as the angels, lovely, and like angels, seldom seen.

"Recovering first, I rose and began to stammer an apology for my presence, while at the first sound of my voice all trace of fear was banished from her countenance, and a sweet smile superseded it, as she interrupted me, saying, in pure English: 'You are an American?'

"'I am,' replied I, surprised at the purity of her diction, adding: 'Have I the pleasure of addressing a country-woman?'

"'No, sir; alas, only the daughter of one!' And her mild gazelle eyes were instantly suffused with tears.

"'Pardon me, miss!' exclaimed I, earnestly approaching her. 'I have unwittingly caused you pain.'

"'No, sir; I seldom think of my dear angel mother, still less mention her, without a betrayal of this weakness. Would she were alive now, to behold the face of one of her people—a boon denied her life-long, and for which she pined amid the gorgeous splendor of her prison.'

"'She was a prisoner, then?' said I, betraying the surprise engendered by my fair companion's words.

"'Ah, yes! To her, 'twas indeed captivity! She was a slave, sir, although my father's favorite wife.'

"She paused, apparently unwilling to proceed, and glanced anxiously towards the villa, which I perceiving, said:

"'You need not apprehend interruption, lady. The house is deserted by all, save the Greek servants and myself. I presume you reside here. How is it that I have not met you before?'

"'You are a stranger, sir, and unacquainted with Turkish customs, or you would not ask that question. In that house are eight ladies and their female attendants, who have never seen the face of man, save their master's and Baba's their keeper. But I must leave you. My presence here may be discovered, when you would be the sufferer.'

"'Nay, nay—go not yet, I beg of you!' I exclaimed, taking her hand, which I retained in my grasp; adding: 'At least, not until you have told me of your mother, whose hard lot, apart from the fact of her nationality, has awakened in me the deepest interest.'

"While I spoke, she remained with her gaze fixed steadily on my countenance, and when I ceased, permitted me to lead her to a seat, when she resumed:

"'You desire my mother's history. You should have heard it from her own lips, when your interest would have been much deeper. But I will gratify your curiosity to the extent of my knowledge, regretting only your advent here at such a late period. Had it happened two years sooner, you might have succeeded in severing her bonds and bearing her to her native land, for which she pined.

"'She was a native of Portland, Maine, and the only daughter of a shipmaster, whom, with her mother, she accompanied on a voyage to Greece when in her thirteenth year. It was long ago, when those seas were infested with pirates, to a gang of which they fell a prey, she and my grandmama alone being spared. They were brought to Constantinople, and exposed in the slave mart for sale, when my father, then a young man, purchased her, and out of pity for the anguish she manifested upon being separated from her mother, purchased the latter as her companion. But grief for her husband's death soon put a period to her existence, leaving my poor mother entirely alone—a stranger and a slave in the hands of barbarians.'

"I started, but she met the indication of my surprise with a sweet smile, continuing:

"'Yes, I said barbarians! for such I know you, and I have been taught by my mother to consider them. Among Turks, she remained a Christian, and such am I.'

"I bowed, my countenance expressing my pleasure, when she proceeded:

"'Two years after my mother's capture and subsequent purchase by my father, he prevailed on her to become his wife, promising that no other should intrude upon her, to rival her in his affections. This promise he observed faithfully eight years, when he broke it by the purchase and introduction to the harem—hitherto occupied by my mother alone—of a beautiful Georgian, who soon assumed full sway of my father, with whom my mother would hold no communication from that hour.

"'I was then one year old, and the youngest of four children, two of whom died in infancy—the eldest, my brother Achemet, being still alive and at present an officer in the Navy of His Sublime Highness the Sultan. To our care and education my mother devoted herself, living for us and us alone, as she has oft assured me, while my father soon became disgusted with the capriciousness of the reigning beauty, which resulted in overtures to my mother for a reconciliation. This she steadily refused, until my father, enraged at her perversity, degraded her to the station of a menial, depriving her of my brother's society, whom he sent to a distance to be educated in the faith of Mahomet, and when old enough, placed him in the service of the sultan. Me he abandoned to my mother's care, for which I thank him, since to that abandonment do I owe all the little knowledge I possess, and a vast fund of amusement, of which my companions—being primevally ignorant—were deprived. I allude to a perusal of my mother's favorite books, of which my father obtained her an ample supply from her native land, during the first few years of their union.

"After my mother's degradation, the harem was filled with inmates from every clime, who were soon changed for others, until at length the presence of some ruling spirit being required to maintain order, my father reinstated my much-injured parent in her former position as mistress of the unruly slaves, though she still refused to acknowledge him as her husband or lord.

"For four years my mother survived her reinstatement, dying two years ago, leaving to me her mantle of office, in which my father confirmed me, much to the chagrin of several Hakims, who had repeatedly offered to buy me. Thus far, my will has been law, and I trust may remain so."

"She paused, while I could not forbear demanding 'why?' when, with an unusual degree of hesitancy, she replied:

"Because I have no desire to exchange El Hamet's harem for any other."

"Have you no desire to behold your mother's native land?" demanded I; when raising her eyes to mine, their brightness at once became dimmed, as she rejoined:

"My mother's native land? O, yes! a burning desire; and to find her kindred. But alas! I dare not cherish a hope."

"Had you occupied my place, Frank, you would have done as I did, implanted that hope, which I prevailed on her to cherish, until it has become part of her being, receiving as my reward her pure and devoted love."

"She regained the harem undiscovered, with the garden of which that in which I met her communicated, so that we were enabled to have several interviews, at subsequent periods. Day before yesterday, however, she found means to convey me a note, warning me to be wary, and yesterday another, warning me to fly—and enjoining me to do so, if I loved her. That injunction I have disobeyed, and by seeming unsuspecting, have I trust averted present danger. All now depends on you. Meta is ready for flight. To gain, and convey her to my own and her mother's native land, I would sacrifice my life. Will you aid me?"

"Yes, to the last drop of my blood, Harding!" I exclaimed, bounding from my seat and grasping his hand. "Tell me how and when, and you may command me and any number of the trustiest of our crew you deem necessary."

With a hearty grasp of the hand, and a few hurried words, he expressed his gratitude; then briefly sketched his plan for the abduction of the lady, which was that I should have a boat, with a trusty crew, lying in shore, near the villa, at midnight. He agreed to meet me there, when, as he assured me, all being in readiness on the part of his fair innamorata, naught remained but to aid in her escape from the harem garden to the boat.

Having agreed upon the mode of procedure, we separated—Harding re-embarking for the shore, and I re-assuming charge of the deck. About four P. M., Captain McLeland came off, when I hastened to admit him to our confidence, requesting permission to use one of the vessel's boats and obtain volunteers for the adventure from amongst her crew.

He flatly refused, at first, grounding his objection upon the risk incurred, and even made a feeble attempt to interpose his authority to prevent the fulfilment of my promise, as regarded myself. We had quite a lengthy debate on the matter, in the course of which I made several allusions to the maiden's history, mentioning at last the fact of her belief in the doctrines of Christianity, which awakened the captain's curiosity to know more.

"A Christian, you say! By what means was she converted from Mohammedanism?"

In reply, I gave him a brief detail of her own and parent's history, as given to my readers, when he exclaimed:

"Enough! You may go, and take the whole crew, if you need them. O, heaven! if she should prove— Did Harding mention her mother's name?"

"No."

"What! neither given, nor surname?"

"Neither, sir. Why?" demanded I, in return.

"O, nothing! I had an idea—a foolish idea—that's all!"

And Captain McLeland shoved both hands deep into his pockets, instantly pulling them out again and running his fingers through his hair, looking very perplexed indeed, in his efforts to appear calm.

"I'll go with you myself, Mr. Alcorn?" said he, at length. "What time do you start?"

"Ten P. M., sir."

"Not till then?"

"No, sir; 'tis but a few miles, and did we arrive at the rendezvous sooner than the hour appointed, we might be discovered, and our presence excite suspicion."

"True, true! I did not think of that!" said the captain, entering his state-room, leaving me greatly perplexed at his evident perturbation.

Unable to solve the mystery, I gave it up, turning my attention to preparations for our adventure.

Supper over, I selected a crew for the boat, and taking them apart, informed them of the task on hand—instructing them in all that related to their share—requesting them to keep the affair a secret from their messmates, who, by awaiting our return, might betray us, in case of pursuit.

All being ready, at ten o'clock we lowered the starboard quarter boat, and took our places—six men, the captain and myself—carrying with us two spare oars to facilitate our escape, should we be discovered and pursued. During the passage to the villa, which we made with but two oars, Captain McLeland maintained the most profound silence; nor even when we landed, did he permit a word to escape him, save a monosyllabic reply to my demand if he desired to take part in effecting an entrance to the garden.

Leaving the boat in charge of the men, with orders to remain seated and prepared to push off at a moment's warning, we proceeded in the direction of El Hamet's residence, on the grounds attached to which we had landed, but had accomplished but a short distance, when a low "hiss!" fell upon my ear.

"Frank!" said I, in reply.

And the next instant, the supercargo was wringing my hand in a fervent grasp, at the same time demanding—"Who's this with you, Frank?"

"'Tis I—McLeland!" said the captain, replying to the question. "I heard you were in a scrape here, and so came along to lend a hand at getting you out."

"For which I thank you, Captain McLeland! But we have no time to spare, El Hamet is asleep in the harem—yet with one eye open, I'll be bound! So we must proceed cautiously."

"And Meta?" demanded I.

"Will meet us in the garden, as soon as she can do so with safety. Baba has accepted a heavy bribe, so that she will experience but little difficulty in making good her exit from the seraglio, if she can but lull to sleep her father's vigilance. Captain McLeland, will you accept the post of sentry outside the wall, in order to apprise us of any danger from outside, and also to receive Meta, whom we must lower from the top, if we ever reach that point with her?"

"With pleasure!" was the captain's brief reply.

"Remain where you are, then," Harding resumed. "Come, Frank, we must scale the wall! Be cautious!"

And taking my hand, he led me a few yards along the high barrier, when he halted, and seizing a rope pendant from its summit, began to mount.

He soon reached the top, and I followed him; when hauling the rope up, he dropped the end on the inside, and commenced his descent in silence. In less than a minute he had landed, and I was following him, when footsteps and the rustling of silk fell upon my ear, causing me to pause and shiver with dread of discovery as the moon, till then obscured by clouds, unveiled her face momentarily, shining full on my person.

"Quick! Down, for your life!" hissed my companion; and in an instant I was crouching at his side, while the person—a lady—whose presence had aroused our fears, came into view and was hurrying past within a few yards, when Harding ejaculated "Meta!" and she turned towards us, rushing into his arms, exclaiming:

"O haste, for mercy's sake! The eunuch guard of the harem are aroused, and I fear are on my track. I heard the order to search the garden, given by the chief, as I hurried through the inner parterre."

Ere the last words had left her lips, I had reached the top of the wall, on which she was safely landed ere a minute had elapsed, when quickly lowering her on the outside, I had the satisfaction of seeing her safely released from the rope and in the arms of the captain, who hurried off towards the boat, leaving us to make good our escape.

My companion was soon at my side, but burning with impatience to join his betrothed, refused to await a descent by the usual manner, and leaping from the wall, was out of hearing ere I touched the ground. Reaching the boat, I found them in the act of embarking, when having seen them safely on board, I followed, giving the order to shove off.

I had taken the precaution to muffle the oars, so that little, if any noise, attended our flight; while not a word escaped the lips of any, until we had placed at least a mile between us and the scene of our escalade. Even then, we only uttered a few brief congratulations, the men continuing their exertions until we ran under the barque's counter, when the oars were unshipped and the boat laid alongside—Captain McLeland bounding up the gangway ladder and receiving the maiden from her lover, who quickly followed, simultaneously with myself, and with the captain and his young charge, entered the cabin.

Ordering the boat to be hooked on and hoisted up as quietly as possible, I left the second mate—who had been awaiting our return—to attend to the execution of my orders, and entered the cabin at the instant that Captain McLeland, addressing the maiden, said :

"Pardon a stranger's impertinence, miss; but having heard a portion, or rather a brief detail of the strange and eventful history of your deceased parent, I cannot control a desire to learn her name. The only excuse I can offer, is that I am a native of the city named as her birth-place."

"And sufficient, sir!" was the answer from the ruby lips of the most angelic creature I ever beheld, and who proceeded: "Her name, prior to her captivity, was Harriet."

"What! Had she no other?" demanded the captain, again struggling to appear calm, and, unconscious of the act, laying his hand on Meta's arm, who instantly replied:

"O, yes! and one that you have probably heard, as she had relatives who bore it. 'Twas McLeland."

"McLeland!" ejaculated her lover and myself simultaneously, while the captain shouted:

"I knew it! Come to my arms, child—I was her brother!"

With a wild cry of joy, and exclaiming, "dear, dear uncle," the poor girl threw herself into the embrace of the worthy captain, whose long pent-up emotions found vent in tears of joy as unexpected as profound.

Why should I proceed further? Of course my friend was made happy with the hand of the charming creature whose heart he had won, while our worthy captain, no less happy in the recent discovery of his sister's child, than proud of her matchless beauty, blessed the wedded pair—his niece no more than her husband, to whom he owed the pleasure of their meeting.

As a natural consequence, Achemet El Hamet was very wroth when he discovered the loss of his daughter. But he was too late to regain her.

She was a wedded wife, and under the protection of the stars and stripes; while her worthy uncle, by a well-timed threat of exposure, ruinous to the former's business interests, rendered him as docile as a lamb.

Captain Harding recently sailed for Constantinople, carrying with him his lovely wife, at the earnest request of her father, whose heart yearned towards her during her absence here more than ever, from which fact we may justly infer that her visit to her birthplace will be rendered at least pleasant, though it will be necessarily brief, when she will return to the land of her adoption to take permanent possession of the home of which, thanks be to her worthy uncle's wealth and doting love, she is to be henceforth the presiding genius, and in which we may hope she will never know cause to regret her Oriental home, or the hour she became OUR SUPER-CARGO'S BRIDE.

THE WISDOM OF THE SERPENT.

I observed (says Abbe Domeneck) that when I began to preach, several Frenchmen and young Creoles, having no great love for sermons, left the church and went to walk in my garden, where they amused themselves by making bouquets of my choicest flowers. For some time I sought an expedient which, without wounding the lively sensibilities of these gentlemen, would oblige them to remain in the church and respect my flowers. I found a very simple means of arriving at my end without betraying my intentions. In the menagerie, which I got up by degrees, was a fine looking wild boar, which I had trained up as a watch dog. On my going to say high mass, I let him loose in the garden. At the sight of this new warder, the marauders made off with all possible speed, and returned to the church patiently to hear the sermon.

"THE PRESENT COMPANY EXCEPTED."

At a public dinner in the country, a farmer, while relating something to the company about two Chinese women, said: "I declare they were the ugliest women I have seen anywhere." There happening to be two maiden ladies present of no remarkable beauty, the farmer, who was a little misty, began to think he had made a mess of it, and that they would imagine he was alluding to them; so, to put matters straight, (as he thought,) he added, "the present company excepted." Roars of laughter ensued, and in a few minutes both farmer and ladies had vanished.—Eccentric Anecdotes.

REASON AND ROMANCE.

The gorgeous pageantry of timee gone by,—
The tilt, the tournament, the vaulted hall—
Fades in its glory on the spirit's eye,
And fancy's bright and gay creation—all
Sink into dust, when reason's searching glance
Unmasks the age of knighthood and romance.
S. L. FAIRFIELD.

A SONG.

BY FANNY BELL.

'Twas not when earthly flowers were springing,
When skies were sheen,
And wheat was green,
And birds of love were singing,
That first I loved thee, or that thou
Didst first the tender claim allow.

For when the silent woods had faded
From green to yellow,
And fields were fallow,
And the changed skies o'ershaded,
My love might then have shared decay,
Or passed with "summer songs" away.

'Twas winter—care and clouds were round me,
Instead of flowers,
And sunny hours,
When love unguarded found me:
Mid wintry scenes my passion grew,
And wintry cares have proved it true.

Dear are the hours of summer weather,
When all is bright,
And hearts are light,
And love and nature joy together;
But stars from night their lustre borrow;
And hearts are closer twined by sorrow.

TREASURE TROVE.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

"Yes, on the whole, I think I do pity Charlie a little—a very little," was the slow, deliberate answer given by Helen West, in replying to her sister Sophia, who, after detailing the incidents of her morning calls, had appealed to her for pity towards Charles Armstrong, their own cousin.

"Very thoughtfully said, sister Helen," said a young man, who had been so very quietly reading in a dusky corner, that his sisters had forgotten he was there. "What has been done to Charlie, to call forth the pity of two such sorrowful looking damsels? One would think he was to be set in the stocks, or some other punishing place, to see your countenances."

"Don't, John," said Sophia. "I will tell you. Charles has got mistaken in his wife. He married her for her pretty looks, you know, and he finds now that she has no other merit."

"Now you are unjust, Sophia," said Helen, warmly. "Kate Armstrong has good and noble qualities, only that no occasion has yet drawn them out. Charles has spoiled her with petting and flattering her beauty, and now he expects her to be a perfect woman. I have not much sympathy for him."

"Bravo, Helen! that is generous, at least, when we consider that Charlie left you for Kate Ward."

"Nonsense!" cried Helen; but the quick blush that overspread her cheek told that there had been some romance, as well as nonsense.

"Well, well, I will not tease you, because I see you are sewing for me. That is a pretty, little gold thimble you have there. Will you tell me who gave you that? I don't believe father gives you pin-money enough to indulge in such articles, unless he is more generous to you than he is to me. But never mind, I see you don't want to tell me. So now, tell me more about Charlie."

"Well, to begin at the beginning—"

"No, Sophia, let Helen tell me herself. I consider her the most reliable of the two. You are apt to exaggerate, you know."

It was not true—so his sister was not angry. Sophia had always been remarkable for her straightforward, conscientious way of speaking; especially when the subject was the faults of others; but John preferred to hear what Helen would say.

"Well, then, Kate has disappointed his hopes in every possible way. He is not rich, as you know, and he wishes her to be economical. She, on the contrary, spends large sums for trifles that she could do without. He wants her to give up going to balls and parties, except for an occasional one. She wants to go to all, and, of course, must have numerous dresses. Then, after a course of such amusements, she is ill, and unfit to perform the duties of her family; lying whole days in bed or on the couch; and when Charlie comes home, the house is one scene of uproar and confusion with the children and their nurse. I don't know as I can tell anything more definite," she continued, relapsing into her thoughtful mood, "but this, every one knows—that Cousin Charles is a disappointed and unhappy man."

John whistled "'I'm over young to marry yet.' And I'm very glad that I am. No wife for this child, till he sees her in all her moods. You need not laugh, girls, I shall go to board with the family before I propose."

Helen was right. Charlie was unhappy. In years gone by, when she was scarce more than a child, Charles Armstrong had shown great affection for his Cousin Helen, for which she was perpetually jested at by the family, who all considered it a childish affair, not knowing how deep was the impression on both. Sensitive and shy, Helen avoided him while she dearly loved him, and he, in a fit of boyish indignation, engaged himself to Kate Ward, who, as the sisters said, was only remarkable for her pretty face. He found her in a ball-room, it is true—but, as Sophia remarked, he did not want to see her there always. They had married young, had now two children, and Charlie's means were getting low from the large drain which Kate made upon them for show and style, which, considering that she brought him no portion, was scarcely to be expected.

John West after hearing his sisters discuss the subject, went immediately to Charles. He found him extremely dull, and wearing an anxious look which John noticed, and spoke kindly to him respecting it. Although his cousin was much younger than himself, still Charles had always thought very highly of his judgment; and he did not hesitate to confide in him now.

"I am going to Australia, John. I cannot stand this way of life any longer. I am shockingly in debt, and my creditors know that I am living far beyond my means. I go privately in the next ship that sails."

"Privately! Kate knows it, does she not?"

"Not a word. I shall write to her from New York, send her all the money I have, and hope to be able to give her one day, enough to satisfy even her large demands. But if I stay here I shall never be worth anything. There, I have two friends who will assist me until I can help myself. John, will you and the girls sometimes look in upon Kate and the children, and report to me how they are getting along?"

John promised; and promised also, to keep his departure a secret until he knew the ship had sailed.

Great was the astonishment of all, except John West, when Charles was reported absent. Kate was nearly distracted when his letter came. It was the first intimation she had received. She thought that he was going to New York for a few days only; and before she could reasonably expect him, he was gone, and the letter, though kind and affectionate, told her too truly that Charles thought her extravagant and wasteful; and that he must spend his life in hard labor to supply her demands. The tone of the letter roused up all that was passionate in her nature, until she came to the close, which was evidently written under great agitation, and expressed everything affectionate and tender.

"I love you, Kate," he wrote, "and will cheerfully work for all your reasonable demands. Our children, remember, must be educated at any cost whatever. Ask yourself if you are willing to forego the calls of vanity and extravagance, in order that they may become wise and learned. Your superfluous dresses cost last year, according to an estimate which you gave me yourself, more than enough to keep Willy a year at college! Choose then, whether you will apply the money which I shall be earning to that purpose, or spend it upon that which does not satisfy."

"God helping me, I will do what is right," said the desolate woman, as she read this letter over her child's cradle that night through her blinding tears. But that was a hard task, look at it how she might. Such habits as hers, indolent, extravagant, unthrifty—what a world of trouble to subdue them! Several days elapsed, during which she saw no one. In her lonely chamber, revolving what course to take, where to retrench, how to do without resources, she gazed at the sum sent her by her husband, and thought how little way it would go, if she lived and spent as she had done. The Wests kept aloof—but ready to take her by the hand if she expressed but the slightest wish for their assistance, yet feeling a delicacy about offering counsel to a woman who was situated just as she was.

On the third day, however, a little note was handed to Helen, which ran thus:

"Come to me, Cousin Helen. Charlie used to quote you and your excellencies to me until I was tired of hearing them. Now, I should be glad to learn some of your ways, if you can bear our lonely house, and the desolation you will find here. Come, and tell me how I can become a worthy woman—worthy of my poor Charlie."

That night Helen stayed with Kate, and many succeeding ones too—helping her to plan, to retrench, to contract her expenses into the smallest possible space, and yet not to appear mean. Many superfluities were parted with; some to friends who paid well for them—others to a shop in another town, where they knew nothing of the people, and did not realize a great deal from their sale.

Mr. West knew of an excellent family who wanted a part of a house in a central situation, and Kate submitted to live in fewer rooms, whereby she saved a handsome sum. She did wisely, and had her reward in the truly valuable friends whom she thus brought under her roof. Her establishment now consisted of a few, genteel, neatly furnished rooms, and therefore she needed less help. She dismissed two of her three servants, keeping the eldest and most experienced, and taking care of the children herself. She was surprised to find that time lagged less heavily now that she had so much to do, and that it seemed so very short. No time now for lying down. She submitted almost meekly, for her, to all Helen's suggestions, though she flamed up a little one day, when Helen said very gently :

"Kate, had you not better wear a plainer dress to-day? You know Mr. —'s daughter is coming here, and I need not say why you should not appear so magnificent before her."

Kate flushed scarlet. The lady was the daughter of Charlie's largest creditor. It was a struggle to bend herself to circumstances, but she did come down with a dress from which she had stripped every vestige of the rich and costly trimmings. Helen was so full of praise, and assured her so pleasantly that the dress was absolutely improved, that she lost her momentary vexation.

For several days Kate had been quite private in her interviews with a young clerk from a card printing establishment, and Helen had rallied her a good deal about it, but without discovering her secret. One morning she entered the sitting-room with a handsome card in her hand, and gave it to Helen. Surprised and pleased, the latter read the announcement that Mrs. Armstrong would receive a limited number of pupils in music. This was Kate's single accomplishment, and Helen was delighted.

"No more talk about learning from me, Kate," she said. "You are ahead of your teacher, I think. I had not dreamed of this."

Kate had—and she fulfilled the vision. In three months she had as many pupils as she could teach. At first it was difficult to make people believe that the gay and indolent Mrs. Armstrong could be a good teacher; but the assurance of the West family that she was in earnest and would succeed, induced many to try her.

Kate had many battles with her pride, and shed many bitter tears over its wounds. She won her way to humility with much tribulation; and sometimes it was hard telling whether she or pride got the victory. One thing was certain, she spent no dollar of her husband's earnings, although he sent home drafts of great value, and supposed that she used them. She acknowledged their receipt, but nothing more. She even laid aside from her own earnings, although a nursery-maid had been added to her household, since she had begun to teach.

If Charles had thought Kate beautiful once, how much more so would she have appeared to him now. True, she did not look as if she mourned his absence much; for her eyes sparkled and her cheeks glowed. She had become stronger, and looked almost queenly in the plain, dark dresses which she selected now with taste, but yet for durability and usefulness.

It was five years since Charlie went away, and he had not once mentioned coming home. Kate had always written that they were "comfortable," and he believed that, in her sense of the word, it meant that she was living in style. He knew that he had supplied her with means to do so. He saw no one from home, and her letters and the few written him by the Wests, were the only communications that he received.

Willy was now eight years old, and at a first rate school; and the little girl was six, and a beauty like her mother. Kate said that little Minnie should be a better woman when she married than she was. She had dismissed her last pupil one golden afternoon, and sent Milly over for Helen and Sophia to come to tea. They came in their pretty, white summer dresses, and Kate, seeing them approach, donned hers also, and twined a rose-bud and geranium blossom in her hair, offering them the same beautiful ornaments for their smooth, glossy tresses. They sat down to tea in a room overlooking the garden, the children beside them. It was a pleasant sight, the three beautiful women, and the sweet, intelligent children. They were laughing and chatting gaily—a cheerful, happy group.

"If Charlie were here—" began Kate, but she broke down, and her eyes looked moist.

"You will have a letter to-night," said Helen, "I heard the mail was in."

Almost before she had done speaking, she saw Kate's eyes open wide, and her cheek grow pale and red by turns. She rose from her seat and went trembling and staggering to the piazza. There was no beckoning ghost there—but Charles Armstrong himself, alive and strong-looking, and with such a beard!

They live for each other and their true friends now—not for other people's eyes. Kate has her little faults still—she is not a perfect woman yet—but her husband has confidence in her; and, on the whole, they are quite happy for married people!

WORKING-CLASS FUNERALS IN NAPLES.

It is the custom at Naples, whenever a person is considered in the last agony, for every friend or relation, whether husband or wife, father or mother, to leave the house, to which they do not return again until eight days after the funeral; neither do they attend the funeral. But as every person belongs to a burial club, the members of that society attend, dressed in white, and the expenses are paid out of the fund of the club, which, as most persons are buried without a coffin, does not cost the society much money.—Journal of an Italian Tourist.

Oratory is the huffing and blustering spoiled child of a semi-barbarous age.

THE COQUETTE.

BY REV. T. HYATT.

We met again. I did not think
To meet thee evermore,
Save as we met as strangers,
In those happy days of yore,
When no garland wreath of beauty
Had entwined around thy brow
Those flowers so vain and gaudy
Which you wear so freely now.

The happy glance is in thine eye,
The smile is on thy lips:
For like the bee, that honey
From every blossom sips,
Thy heart no single love contains,
Like maiden fond and true;
But when you give one lover pain,
You wish that he was two.

And now you fain would win me
Unto that changing heart:
But ah, the spell is broken,
And no magic can impart!
I smile to think how coldly
I, too, can part and meet—
Then win some other lover back,
To spurn him at thy feet.

F A T E :

—OR,—

PAUL DRESSLER'S DREAM.

BY MISS CARRIE E. FAIRFIELD.

PAUL DRESSLER a forger! Impossible. My high-bred, aristocratic and most fastidious friend the inmate of a cell in the Tombs! The idea was intolerable; yet it was true, as the hasty note which I held in my hand, pencilled in the first moments of his surprise and overwhelming indignation, informed me.

"Paul will be more a fatalist than ever," I said to myself, as I walked down Broadway, on my way to the cell of the prisoner. "That was a curious dream which he related to me the other day, foreshadowing so conclusively, at least to himself, some impending danger and disgrace, to be borne patiently for a while, for the inexpressible sweetness which was to flow therefrom."

I recalled that pleasant evening, when I had sat in his room, inhaling the fragrance of his unequalled Havanas, sipping his rare old Rhenish wine, from glasses which reflected its lambent hues from a thousand dazzling points; I pictured his elegant figure, robed in a magnificent Turkish dressing gown, the elegant, embroidered velvet slippers, the work of fairy fingers, which covered his slender, well-shaped foot; the velvet smoking cap which sat so jauntily upon his dark curls, its long silken tassel depending so gracefully upon his shoulders. I thought how his dark eye had flashed, and his marble brow had crimsoned with indignation as he spoke of some slight peccadillo which had been attached to his name; how the proud hauteur of his nature had kindled, and a smile of scorn had wreathed his delicate, well-cut lips, as he mentioned the author of the scandal.

"Have you taken the pains to contradict the falsehood?" I had asked.

"No, indeed," was his indignant reply. "I would not stoop so low as to notice the cur. The name of Paul Dressler was never before associated with anything vile, and it is not in the power of such as he to sully its purity. The calumny will instantly recoil upon his own head."

And this was the man who was now confined in a criminal's cell in the Tombs, with the ignominy of a forger's doom written upon his future. For I saw at once from the information which his hurried note had given me, that the evidence was strong against him, and whatever money and influence might do for him, he probably could never clear his fair fame in the eyes of the world. I longed to meet him, and see how he bore this new phase of life.

"Paul, my old friend," I said, as I grasped his extended hand, "how do you find yourself—comfortable, I hope?"

A calm, though rather faint smile lighted up his features, as he replied, "That is hardly the word to be applied to a man in my situation, though I am not unduly shocked by this most unexpected development of fate."

"Still a philosopher, I see; well, I am glad of it, though I can't say that I think even the sublime doctrine of fatalism would enable me to sustain my equanimity under such trials as these."

"I do not know what else but fate you can call it, when a man of my character and standing is assailed by such charges as these. Surely there is no accounting for it upon rationalistic grounds."

"Well, there I should differ with you again; but I did not come here to review the old ground of argument, but to see what I could do for you in a professional way. State your case to me now, and let me see what legal lore is likely to avail you."

"I will do so," he replied, "but first you must allow me to remind you of that singular dream which I related to you the other evening. I thank the angel of my life for that friendly warning. It is the key to all my present calmness."

I smiled, and bade him proceed with the details of his present situation. My friend Paul had been bred the son of a millionaire, and his tastes were consequently most refined and luxurious. About a year previous to the opening of our story, his father had unexpectedly become embarrassed and had died insolvent. Paul bore this reverse with the utmost philosophy, and immediately accepted a situation in a bank, with a salary of two thousand a year. He had never been restless or discontented with this change, never had uttered one complaining word, and those who knew him best, felt that the spirit which he manifested was most admirable. Now, however, with the suddenness of a thunder burst, had come upon him this overwhelming charge, sustained, too, by an appearance of justice which seemed almost incontrovertible.

Of the details of the case it is not necessary to inform the reader; suffice it, that after pondering over them for several hours, I could see but one way of conclusively proving the innocence of my client, and that was by establishing the guilt of the real criminal. With this end in view I conferred with the officers of the institution, and became acquainted with the character of every person in their employ; but the more I investigated the more I became convinced of the almost impossible nature of my undertaking.

The day of trial drew near, and still but little headway had been made in establishing the innocence of my poor friend. I was harassed, perplexed, chagrined. Never before had I been so signally foiled in my endeavors to aid an innocent person, and that this complication of untoward events should surround one so dear to me as Paul Dressler, was the greatest aggravation of all. Yet he was perfectly calm through it all.

"How is it," said I, one day, half impatient at his stoicism, "that while I am beating my brains incessantly for some remedy for this injustice, and actually wearing myself out in my endeavors to rescue you, no Spartan was ever more immovable than you, in your calmness and philosophy? Confound it! I don't see into it."

He smiled, and replied, "You have not my faith, my friend. I am convinced that for whatever I may suffer in the present, the future will bring me a bountiful recompense. I early learned that an undisturbed mind and a perfect trust in a higher power, was the only secret of true happiness. This has been my philosopher's stone through life, the talisman which has gilded every phase of adversity with the fine gold of contentment. Therefore I am, even in this rude cell, deprived of so many of the comforts and luxuries to which I have been accustomed, still undisturbed in my equanimity, and in my faith."

I admired, while I could scarcely comprehend his serenity.

"I think," he continued, "that before the day of my trial, some new light will be shed upon this case. A lady will be the messenger, and if she be only half as beautiful as the being who opened the door of my dungeon in my dream, and led me forth into the daylight, I shall certainly fall in love with her."

He smiled playfully, and I asked, "What was that dream, Paul, I've more than half forgotten it?"

"You remember that I was walking on a pleasant hillside, when suddenly the earth caved beneath my feet, and I was entombed alive, in a gloomy recess of the mountain. I lived there a long time—I know not how long—in intense darkness, when suddenly, a ray of light pierced the gloom; then an opening appeared in the rocky walls, and a creature as beautiful as a Peri, yet surely human, stood in the gateway, and reaching forth her hand, led me out into the open country. My garments were covered with the moist earth of my dungeon, but she told me not to brush it off, and I walked on with her a long distance, happy in her society, yet even conscious that my garments were soiled; when suddenly the sky grew bright and golden, the landscape changed to one upon the Rhine, which in my early travels I thought the fairest that the sun shone on, and which has ever since lived in my memory; my garments were changed for white and glistening ones, and in the midst of my joy and amazement, I awoke."

I laughed as he concluded, and replied, "I should dislike to be in your place, Paul, with no better foundation for hope than such a dream, singular as it is. Yet, nous verrons! If that young lady intends to interpose in your behalf, I hope she will make her appearance very shortly, before my hair gets any grayer in your service. Positively, I can't disfigure myself in this way much longer, to accommodate her bashful delays."

He smiled at my rather ill-timed playfulness, and replied:

"It is fate, my dear sir, fate arranges all; be still and you will see."

One week only was to intervene until his trial, and as yet I saw no hope for my poor friend; but he was calm as ever. I was with him one day in his room, which looked out upon the street; I sat by the table writing, while he stood by the window.

"There she comes!" he exclaimed, joyfully.

"Who?" I asked in amazement, for I had forgotten the dream.

"My lady preserver; you will see her soon, for she has entered the building."

I ran to the window, but she had disappeared. In a few moments, however, a messenger entered to say a lady wished to see Mr. Dressler.

"Show her up," said Paul, calmly.

The next few minutes seemed interminable to me, but Paul's serenity was unshaken, only I saw by the gleam of his dark blue eye, that faith approached almost to certainty, while I confess I greatly dreaded a disappointment.

Presently we heard the slow tread of the jailer along the hall; at first I thought he was alone, but Paul's quicker ear caught the light footfall, and his countenance brightened with expectation. The door swung heavily upon its iron hinges, the jailer stepped to one side and admitted the lady. She was rather tall, but of slight and elegant proportions. Her features were exquisitely moulded, her complexion of alabaster hue, contrasting strangely with her dark, satiny hair, and deep-set, brilliant eyes of hazel brown, fringed with long, curving lashes which completely shaded the eyes as they drooped beneath our earnest gaze.

A faint rose-hue tinged her cheek, as the jailer announced "Miss Courtney." "Miss Helen Courtney," read the card which the lady extended to Paul, as with the most winning grace and dignity she accepted the offered seat.

"My friend and legal adviser, Mr. Trevor, Miss Courtney," said Paul, with all the self-possession in the world, glancing at me.

I had started at the sound of her name, for I distinctly remembered that a Mr. Courtney had been among the clerks in the bank in which Paul had been engaged; and there was something in his handsome but care-worn face which had made a marked impression on my memory. I am afraid the fixed gaze with which I responded to her graceful salutation was hardly courteous, but it certainly satisfied me that she was a relative, probably a sister of the said clerk.

"Mr. Dressler," commenced the lady, after a moment's hesitation, "I had intended that the communication which I have to make to you should be private. If this, however, is your confidential legal adviser, there will be no objection to his remaining in the room—his presence may be of service."

I immediately proposed retiring, but Paul replied:

"He is not only my confidential legal adviser, but also my most esteemed friend; if, therefore, as you intimate, his services may be of aid to you, do not hesitate to disclose in his presence anything which you may have to communicate."

"You will remain then, if you please, Mr. Trevor," she replied, "as the painful disclosures which I have to make will necessarily come immediately under your cognizance."

She hesitated a moment, and I thought a slight tremor passed over her, but she was not long in regaining her womanly dignity and composure. Turning to Paul, she continued:

"You are doubtless aware, Mr. Dressler, that you are at present the victim of a deeply-laid and well-matured plan of fraud."

She paused again, and Paul, to relieve her embarrassment, replied:

"I have indeed realized the futility of endeavoring to disentangle the meshes of this most artfully woven net. Both myself and my friends have been amazed at the amount of intellect displayed in the concoction of the scheme, and deplored the fact that it was employed in so unworthy a cause."

"It was not to win compliments for my poor brother's genius that I came here," she replied, with shortened breath, "but to confess his guilt. The real criminal in this case is my only brother, Hubert Courtney."

Her pale lip quivered, and she bit it to repress her emotion. I confess I was a good deal shocked, and Paul certainly was not less so, at this declaration. That the brother of such a being as she evidently was, should commit such a crime was painful to us both. Paul replied, however, with scarcely less than his usual composure:

"This announcement is certainly a most startling one, and very nearly affects my welfare; yet I sympathize too deeply with the affliction which such a belief must be to you, not to require good proof of the facts. Are you prepared to substantiate them?"

"I am but too well prepared, sir," she replied, mournfully. "My brother's confession made upon a bed of sickness, caused by the weight of guilt which oppressed his conscience, is certainly conclusive evidence."

"I can hardly express my amazement at this development," said Paul. "I have had a slight acquaintance with Mr. Courtney ever since I entered the bank, and I certainly deemed him one of the most honorable and gentlemanly men whom I ever met. There must have been some terrible temptation to this crime."

"There was indeed a motive," said Miss Courtney. "Hubert and myself were born of wealthy parents, and reared amid luxury and elegance. Circumstances deprived us of our patrimony the same year that Death robbed us of both our parents. After that we were entirely dependent upon his exertions for support. We were enabled to live comfortably, though by no means elegantly upon his salary; but it was impossible for us to lay aside anything. This fact disturbed my poor brother exceedingly, especially as his rapidly failing health reminded him that I should soon be left without a protector. That his only sister should be left to want and destitution, was a thought too grievous to be borne. Often have I heard him say, 'Had I but a few thousand dollars of capital, how quickly could I amass sufficient to make you, my sister, comfortable for life; but for the want of this I must die and leave you, not only utterly friendless, but without a dollar.' Under these circumstances he first conceived the idea of borrowing a few thousand dollars by means of forged paper, fully intending to repay it as soon as circumstances would allow.* The horrible fear of detection, and the thought of the unmitigated sorrow which such consequences would entail upon me, led him to arrange his plans in such a way that should any accident happen to disclose the forgery, suspicion would attach itself to some other individual. Mr. Dressler was selected for this purpose, not on account of any personal ill-will, but because his business relations with my brother were such that he could most easily be entrapped. That such consequences ever would ensue, of course he did not for a moment believe, yet when his scheme was actually frustrated, and the worst transpired, he was for a time too completely overwhelmed with the thought of what he had escaped, to have the courage voluntarily to assume the penalty which justly belonged to him. Conscience, however, would not be stilled. His secret sufferings wore upon his feeble frame, till he was brought to a bed of illness, upon which he confessed to me his whole crime. Of course there was but one thing left to do, and that was to make instant reparation for the fault, as far at least as was possible. You have now the facts. Of course you, Mr. Dressler, are free, and I scarcely dare entreat you to use your influence that my poor brother may be as leniently treated as is compatible with the ends of justice."

You should have seen Paul's face at that moment. I shall never forget the expression of that noble, magnanimous soul, nor the radiant smile with which he replied:

"I rejoice most heartily, Miss Courtney, that you came directly to me with this disclosure, before confiding it to any other person, since it gives me the opportunity of doing justice to your unfortunate brother, whose character I can but respect even more highly than before, since his generous affection for his only sister must ever endear him to me, while the crime of which he is accused, sinks into a venial and almost pardonable error when the motive is taken into consideration. Trevor, you have often assured me that it was quite possible to extricate me from this dilemma by means of the powerful friends who are arrayed upon my interest, and the means which may be called into requisition. Hitherto, I have refused to accept freedom, while the slightest taint rested upon my honor. Is it too late now to avail myself of these means?"

In vain I demurred to the proposition which I saw he was about to make. In vain Miss Courtney insisted that it should not be. The unfortunate young man had evidently suffered, he said, all that justice required, and quite enough to prevent the recurrence of any such crimes. His delicate health, and the fact that his sister's happiness depended upon his life, which would undoubtedly be sacrificed by the disgrace of an exposure, warranted us in concealing his guilt from the world, especially as it probably could be done at only a slight sacrifice upon his part. In short he overruled all our objections, and Miss Courtney bade him farewell with a light heart, and overflowing eyes.

"O, Mr. Dressler," she exclaimed, "you cannot imagine the debt of gratitude which we shall forever owe you. May God, who only can comprehend the obligation as I feel it, reward you from his infinite bounty." And clasping the hand which he had extended in adieu, she touched the delicate fingers with her lips, and then blushing crimson at her own boldness, she drew her veil and departed.

From that moment Paul's enthusiasm was aroused, and he labored with more energy than I supposed he possessed, to arrange plans to procure his acquittal. His family was one of the most influential in the city, and as they firmly believed in his innocence, they were determined that no stone should be left unturned to procure his pardon; and in that great city of Gotham, what will not money do?

Paul had leaned on no broken reed when he trusted to money influence for his acquittal, and that without the use of any illegal means. His first call after his discharge was upon Miss Courtney, to assure her of his pardon, and his restoration to the confidence of the officers of the bank, which was effected by confiding to them the actual state of affairs. Hubert was of course obliged to resign his situation, but as they were induced to keep the secret of his guilt, and allow his illness to pass as his excuse for leaving, he had no difficulty in obtaining another situation, where his labors were lighter, and his salary consequently less.

After this I watched with the deepest interest the progress of Paul's acquaintance with Miss Courtney. That he had been in love with her from the first moment I had never doubted, and it seemed to me that she was strongly attracted at times toward him. Still there were times when her conduct towards him puzzled me exceedingly. At last I said to him one day:

"Paul, you'll never win that girl in the world. She likes you well enough, and she feels very grateful for all you have done for the family, and she dislikes very much to treat you coldly; yet I think I can plainly distinguish in her manner, that beyond this she cares nothing for you; and you surely would not have her prove false to the best feelings of her nature by bestowing her hand without her heart."

"Helen Courtney is not capable of such falsity," was his reply, as his fine face grew a shade paler. "I have noticed the peculiarities of which you speak, but I believe I have penetrated more deeply into the recesses of her nature than you. I think she loves me, but she is embarrassed by the circumstances of our acquaintance. Besides, she is too proud, I fear, to marry a man from whom she has accepted so great an obligation as she fancies is implied in my conduct towards her brother. However, my friend, I am going to put an end to this suspense this very evening. To-morrow you shall know the worst."

"Well, how is it?" I asked, as I entered his room the next evening.

He looked up calmly and replied: "I was flatly refused."

"As I anticipated," I replied, "yet I am sorry for you, Paul, for she is a fine girl."

"Not as you anticipated at all," said he. "I was indeed refused, yet I won from her an acknowledgment that she was not indifferent toward me, and that were the obligation between us cancelled, she might consent to an engagement."

"Well, then, all that remains for you to do is to go directly out and stab somebody, and then throw all the blame upon her. That will make you even, and herself a little more."

Paul did not relish my pleasantry.

"You know," said I, "that I never did fancy such fine-spun sentimentalism so much as some, and when it stands in the way of the happiness of two such people as you and Helen, whom I've thought a sensible girl, I like it less than ever."

But Paul loudly applauded his lady's delicacy, and expressed himself perfectly contented to wait until he could overcome her scruples. Three years passed, and matters remained precisely in the same condition. Hubert's failing health, however, gave tokens that their probation drew to a close, as in answer to his eager entreaties to be allowed openly to confess his crime, and thus relieve the lovers of their embarrassment, it had been agreed that at his death, the secret should be disclosed, and Paul's character cleared in the eyes of the world. Through another year of lingering consumptive decay, they watched his gradual departure, and at last in the golden flush of the autumn, they laid him down to rest.

At his request, that Helen might not be left unprotected, the marriage ceremony was performed at his bedside, and with his latest breath he blessed them. A confession of his crime, written by his own hand, was published immediately after his death, together with a simple account of the generosity which had shielded him from public disgrace during his life-time.

Thus the clouds cleared from the horizon of Paul Dressler's life, and the prophetic sunshine of his dream shone goldenly over all his future pathway. After his marriage with Helen, although I was no less a skeptic than ever, I never argued with him again about Fate.

DEATH OF LOUIS XVI.

Louis alighted. Two of the executioners came to the foot of the scaffold to take off his coat. He waved them away, and himself removed his coat and cravat, in order that his throat might be presented bare to the knife; they then came with cords to bind his hands behind his back.

"What do you wish to do?" said Louis, indignantly. "Bind you," they replied; and endeavored to fasten his hands with the cords.

"Bind me?" said the king, in tones of deepest feeling. "No, no—I will never consent. You may do your business, but not bind me." The executioners seized him rudely, and called for help. "Sire," said his Christian adviser, M. Edgeworth, "suffer this outrage, as a last resemblance to that God who is about to be your reward. "Assuredly," said the king, "there needed nothing less than the example of God to make me submit to such an indignity." Then holding out his hands to his slayers, he said—"Do as you will, I will drink the cup to the dregs."

With firm step, he ascended the steep steps of the scaffold, looked for a moment upon the keen and polished edge of the axe, and then turning to the vast throng, he said in a clear and untroubled voice:

"People, I die innocent of all the crimes imputed to me. I pardon the authors of my death, and pray God that the blood which you are about to shed, may not fall again on France."

He would have continued, but the drums were ordered to beat, and his voice was drowned. The executioners seized him and bound him to the plank, the slide fell, and the head of Louis XVI. fell into the basket.—John S. C. Abbott.

MY SISTER AND I.

BY OPHELIA M. CLOUTMAN.

WE were twins, my sister and I, in years, but not in looks. Charlotte was beautiful, brilliant and accomplished; I was plain even to homeliness, with only a sound mind and tolerably amiable disposition to recommend me to worldly favor. Of her superior personal charms, my sister was by no means ignorant; her mirror had first revealed the fact of her great physical beauty, while a doting mother and numerous friends only confirmed the truth by their constant praises in her behalf. My mother, a well-preserved woman of forty-five, still prided herself upon her fine appearance, and did not hesitate to ascribe my ill looks to the fault of my close resemblance to my deceased father. Charlotte she declared to be the perfect counterpart of herself; but where the likeness lay, it were difficult for any one to tell.

Upon the death of my father, we had removed from our beautiful city home to a small cottage, situated some nine or ten miles distant from Boston, where, with a moderate income, we were enabled to live comfortably, if not luxuriously. The extreme beauty of my sister Charlotte gained for her a large list of admirers among the opposite sex. Her ready wit and showy accomplishments retained, for a time, the conquests of which she so delighted to boast, and which, truth to say, gratified the pride of her indulgent mama not a whit less than her own. It is a sad thing to confess, but Charlotte Norton was a coquette! who won pure and noble hearts to herself, only to break and rudely fling them away, as a spoiled child is wont to do with toys that have beguiled the passing hour.

My hardy constitution and strong love for study made me ambitious to prepare myself for a teacher. The village academy fostered my rising talents, and sent me forth into the world at the age of eighteen, with a well-stored mind and a heart as warm and generous in its impulses, as Charlotte's was cold and unfeeling.

My catalogue of lovers embraced but a single individual; yet to my devoted and appreciative nature, Edward Manners was in himself a host. I made his acquaintance while spending the winter in Boston with Mrs. Cummings, a wealthy cousin of my mother's, to whose children I had assumed the post of governess. He was the son of a well-known artist of that city, who, in dying, bequeathed his son naught but the legacy of his own great genius.

Edward Manners was not what the world generally would term handsome; yet, in my eyes, he was the true type of manly beauty. Hair brown and wavy was thrown back in rich clusters from a brow lofty and expansive; while the singular brilliancy of his dark eye was in strange contrast to the uniform pallor of his countenance.

What first attracted him to my side was always a source of wonder to my mind. I was neither beautiful nor fascinating; he was grave, yet endowed with fine conversational powers. My awkward manner and shy reserve seemed to attract, rather than repel him. By degrees a strong friendship grew up between us, which, in my joy of heart, I prayed time might not sever.

I was proud to call him my friend, because I sincerely believed him my superior in everything that was noble and intellectual. A thrill of exquisite pleasure shot through my heart, when, night after night, he stole quietly away from the dense throng that filled the drawing room of my benefactor (with whom Edward Manners was an especial favorite), to spend a few hours in agreeable conversation with me, in the solitude of the little school-room where, from choice, I generally spent the most of my evenings.

In the early part of June, I returned home—Mrs. Cummings and family having retired to their country seat in New Hampshire, where they usually remained until October. I was, as it were, a child of Nature; and I looked forward to the bright summer months, with their golden treasures of fruits and flowers, as an oasis in the desert of my hitherto lonely life.

My reception at home, although a kind one, was far from being freighted with that warmth and tenderness for which my loving soul so constantly thirsted. Charlotte was as frivolous and heartless as ever; while my mother still entertained for her that unmistakable preference and partiality which had so often wounded my sensitive heart in early childhood, when I had vainly strove to console myself with the thought that if papa had lived, I, too, should have been loved.

Since the first hour of my acquaintance with Edward Manners, a change had come over my desolate and isolated existence. A new life seemed opened to me, and bright and beautiful lay the unrolled panorama of the future which my imagination had so brilliantly painted before my longing and admiring eyes. I saw in my feverish dreams the laurel wreath of fame encircling the noble brow of Edward Manners. With a throbbing heart, I beheld him kneeling at my feet. In his hand he held the glistening circlet, which he gracefully extended towards me. In breathless delight I stretched forth my hand to receive it; but fingers long and shadowy tore it from my grasp, and with a sharp cry, I awoke from my dream and shuddered lest it might prove to be indeed a reality.

I had been home scarce a fortnight, when Mr. Manners, availing himself of my kind invitation to call upon me, found his way to our rustic and humble retreat. It was a bright summer morn, when pushing aside the drapery of my little casement, to inhale the fresh and invigorating air of the early day, that I espied the tall and manly form of Edward Manners hastening up the neat gravel walk leading to our cottage. My heart beat strangely as I descended to meet him, for I had hardly cherished the hope of a continuance of our friendship when separated by time and distance.

I felt the warm blood mantling my cheek, as I tremblingly returned the pressure of his hand.

"My dear Maggie—" he ventured to say; but at that moment Charlotte appeared, on horseback, beautiful as Hebe after her usual morning ride.

With a single bound, she sprang from the saddle and gracefully alighted at our feet, crying out in a merry, ringing voice:

"O, Meg Wilton! such a race as I've had with Colonel Griffith's niece would have been well worth your sight! I verily believe the timid girl thought me a perfect Amazon, at the rate that I flew over the road, and, Gilpin-like, soon left her far behind! But I perceive that I have already broken in upon an agreeable conversation between two friends," she added, at the same time lifting her dark and lustrous eyes most archly to the face of Edward Manners.

Their eyes met; and a glow of delight overspread the features of the young artist, at sight of the radiant vision before him.

"This is my twin sister, Mr. Manners, Miss Charlotte Wilton, of whom you have often heard me speak," I stammered forth, with a degree of awkwardness quite natural to me.

"Your sister? I declare I should never have suspected it," he replied, in a tone of surprise that seemed to say to my sensitive ear—no wonder, when one is so full of beauty and the other so extremely plain!

The embarrassment of a first introduction over, the young trio entered the cottage, where Charlotte, usurping the place of hostess, at once succeeded in drawing her new-made friend into an interesting conversation, which lasted full an hour, after which, Mr. Manners took his leave; but not without receiving the united invitation of both Charlotte and my mother to visit us often at our rural home.

Weeks passed on, and Edward Manners continued a frequent guest at the residence of the Widow Wilton. At first, his inquiries were particularly after myself, and occasionally we would live over again those hours of social converse and heart-felt sympathy, that had cheered and enlivened my daily existence while a sojourner in Mrs. Cummings's family. The entrance of Charlotte, however, always changed entirely the state of affairs. Extravagantly fond of gentlemen's society, she always labored to fascinate them to the extent of her abilities. There is no surer passport to the affections of a man, than beauty. Intoxicated with the loveliness of the rose, they breathe in its rich fragrance, nor heed the treacherous asp that lies concealed beneath its delicately tinted petals, until reminded of its presence by the deadly and poisonous sting. Then, too late alas! they tear the cherished flower from their breast, and crush it to the earth; but the work of the venomous insect has been speedily and surely accomplished, while the rose, so rudely plucked from its loved resting-place, still sends forth its rare perfume as of old.

Edward Manners was but mortal. The wondrous beauty of Charlotte Wilton enslaved his senses. In his breast, she excited the same degree of admiration that he would have experienced when gazing upon some exquisite piece of sculpture, or some glorious old painting. A desire to constantly feast upon her charms, kept him too often a willing prisoner at her side.

The general attention which my sister received on all sides, would have acted as a check upon the advances of a delicate nature like Edward Manners's, had it not been that the heartless girl, perceiving her power, used it accordingly. In her numerous rides and walks, the bewildered artist was her favored companion. In his absence, his praises were constantly sounding in my ears, until I began to chide myself for having dared to raise my hopes and aspirations towards one so lofty in thought and sentiment.

What Charlotte Wilton saw to admire in Edward Manners, I knew not. Men of wealth and position, attracted by her queenly beauty, fluttered like gorgeous butterflies around her shrine. External beauty, always the first requisite to success in gaining the favor of my fastidious sister, seemed in his case dwindled into entire insignificance. That Edward Manners possessed beauty far more precious in my eyes, viz., that of the mind, I well knew; but I could not believe that one so short-sighted and selfish as Charlotte was, had ever discerned clearly the inner loveliness of soul which lay enshrined within the breast of my beloved friend.

Days and weeks rolled on, and still Edward Manners spent the few hours of recreation, which he contrived to steal from his professional labors, at the cottage of the Widow Wilton. I now saw but little of Edward Manners, for I had been called to supply the place of assistant teacher in a neighboring academy, recently made vacant by the sudden death of the former instructress. At the combined request of both my mother and Charlotte, however, I consented to spend my Sabbaths at home. Lindenwood Lodge, as our school was romantically termed, was only distant some eight or ten miles from N—, where my mother and sister still resided. I often wondered why Edward Manners never visited me, knowing as he did how thoroughly engaged my time was with the pressure of school-room duties. Whatever queries I may have had upon that score, however, were soon satisfactorily, if not agreeably answered by a circumstance which occurred some two months after my instalment at Lindenwood Lodge.

It was Saturday night, and the close of a bright October day. My labors for the week concluded, I had returned home to spend the coming Sabbath. My mother and myself had taken our tea in solitary silence—Charlotte, who was the life and joy of that roof, being absent to the city. How long a time I had been sitting in the twilight of my own little chamber I knew not, when the well known voice of my sister was heard in the hall below, and in another moment she stood before me, hat in hand, as brilliantly beautiful as ever. I noticed that her inquiries after my health were unusually tender, and that the lips pressed against my cold and pallid cheek were hot and feverish. The first words of greeting over, and an awkward pause ensued. Twisting her hat nervously about by the strings, Charlotte slowly moved towards the door. Suddenly pausing upon the threshold, with the air of a person who had forgotten to communicate something, she turned round with an assumption of her naturally childish and playful manner, and said, in a gleesome voice:

"O, sister Meg, I have good news to tell you—news that will make your heart fairly leap with delight to hear."

"Indeed! Pray enlighten me," I replied, my dull countenance brightening strangely, in anticipation of the expected intelligence.

"Well, then, I am at last to be married, and on Christmas eve."

"To whom?" I asked, quietly.

"To whom? Why, to your friend, Edward Manners, to be sure!" she exclaimed, in a tone very expressive of surprise at my ignorance of it.

"Your friend, Edward Manners!" How those cruel words lacerated my already bleeding heart! I made a strong effort towards composure, and begged my sister to proceed.

"There is also one request Edward bade me make," she continued, "which is—"

"What?" I faintly gasped, observing Charlotte's eyes fixed intently upon my fast-changing countenance.

"That you will consent to be our bridesmaid upon the occasion."

Their bridesmaid! Her bridesmaid! She who had cast aside heart after heart, only to rob me of the love of him whose hand had planted the first flowers of affection in my hitherto barren soul! I could hear no more. My head grew dizzy, and all strength seemed deserting me. I made some slight excuse relative to a headache and the extreme closeness of the room, then hurried down stairs and forth into the open air.

The damp atmosphere of evening revived my fainting spirits, while the stillness of the night had also a strangely soothing effect upon my disordered nerves. When I returned to the house, it was to join my mother and sister in the parlor with the same air of calm indifference which was so entirely characteristic of my nature.

I met Edward Manners on the morrow at the dinner-table; but there was no sign of emotion perceptible in my face, or tremulous movement of the hand extended to bid him welcome as of old, that betrayed in the least degree the hidden anguish of the heart within. To my relief, the subject of their settled engagement and proposed marriage was not alluded to by either party in my presence; and the following day saw me depart for Lindenwood Lodge with a soul still unchastened by affliction, and whose trembling lips had still the power to say—"thy will, not mine, be done."

November, with its chilly winds, crept slowly by; and December, with its frost and snow, once again dawned upon our sight. For near six weeks, Charlotte Wilton had lain upon a bed of sickness. Her disease was typhoid fever. Every moment that I could snatch from my prescribed duties at school, was now spent at the bedside of one whom, as a sister, I still fondly loved. My mother's fears for the safety of her child rendered her almost incapacitate in so long and trying an illness. Night after night, Edward Manners and myself hung over the couch of Charlotte, listening in speechless sorrow to the wild ravings of that delirious brain, as the scourge like fever crept like a fiery serpent into her delicate veins.

It was in those hours of solitude and faithful watching, that the innate goodness of Edward Manners's soul shone forth with resplendent light. And when, in his great love, some tender word of endearment addressed to the unconscious invalid fell from his lips, I hastily brushed away the rising tear, and secretly prayed God to make my sister worthy the devotion of so noble a heart.

Edward Manners's treatment towards me was such as one might expect to receive from a kind and affectionate brother. Ever shy and reserved in my manner when in his presence, I was now made doubly so by the haunting thought that, since another claimed his entire love, I, his plain yet sincere friend, had no right to manifest for him other than feelings of common and ordinary friendship.

At last, to the infinite joy of all, Charlotte was pronounced by her physician to be convalescent. Choice fruits and rare flowers were now the offerings of friends who crowded around the couch of the invalid, to offer their earnest congratulations on her recovery. Yielding to the still cherished desire of Edward to be married, if her health should permit, on Christmas eve, as first proposed, Charlotte had reluctantly consented; and under my auspices, the arrangements preparatory to her bridal had already commenced.

In the midst of our excitement and bustle, Edward Manners suddenly left us. He had been called unexpectedly away upon business to the State of New York, which would in all probability detain him for the short space of a week. Yet at thought of even so slight a separation from his beloved, Edward Manners grieved. With manifold charges to my mother and myself to guard the invalid tenderly during his absence, the young artist sorrowfully took his departure.

Charlotte at first affected to mourn for his society, but the hosts of friends which daily besieged our little cottage soon banished, for a time, the remembrance of Edward Manners from the mind of my variable and inconstant sister.

"I am going to the last of the Almacks to-night," said Charlotte, as I entered the chamber where she sat bolstered up in an easy-chair, her face, in its uniform color, scarcely less white than the snowy pillows heaped above her head.

I looked at her a moment or two in perfect amazement, for I could not believe that she was in full possession of her right senses. Not wishing her to suspect that I entertained for an instant the slightest suspicion of her sanity, I replied, carelessly, that she was beginning to appear herself again, inasmuch as she had resumed her old habit of jesting.

"Jesting? I assure you, Meg, that I was never more in earnest, during my whole life, than at the present moment! To the ball I go this night for a certainty, or my name isn't Charlotte Wilton!"

"But the long ride to and from the city, and the excitement to which, as a matter of course, you will naturally be subjected to in a densely crowded hall, will be most disastrous in its consequences," I hurriedly interposed.

"Hush! not a word in opposition to the matter!" she interrupted me by saying. "My mind is made up. I would not miss going for any sum of money, as I have received a special invitation from Lieutenant Rolfe, the nephew of Colonel Griffith, who has recently returned from Europe. Nell has sung my praises so often, in her letters, during his absence, that he is anxious to make my acquaintance, and has accordingly invited me to accompany Nell and him to the ball. So, Meg, you must make me look my prettiest to-night, for captivate Lieutenant Rolfe I must and will!"

And with a nervous laugh, Charlotte attempted to rise for the purpose of beholding herself in the glass. The effort was useless; for, too weak to support herself upon her feet, she sank down into the chair again, with all the helplessness of a babe.

I remonstrated with her against the folly of so hazardous an undertaking, endangering not only her future happiness, but also her life, which hung even now upon a slender thread. I dwelt long upon the devotion of her poor but noble lover. I contrasted his fine intellect and lofty genius, with the man of fashion and reputed wealth, whose susceptible heart the coquettish Charlotte longed to ensnare.

Grieved at my sister's utter selfishness and indifference concerning Edward Manners, I silently left the room for the purpose of seeking my mother's aid in the matter. Her influence, however, availed nothing. It was vain to strive to dissuade Charlotte from her purpose.

Evening came. My mother entreated and I implored. Charlotte was inexorable, and slowly the work of preparing her toilet commenced. After much labor on our part, and terrible exhaustion upon the part of the spoiled and wayward girl, we at last succeeded in putting the finishing touches to her ball costume. As leaning upon my arm, we slowly advanced towards the mirror, Charlotte for the first time, since her illness, caught sight of her pale face and emaciated figure in the glass.

"Heavens!" she exclaimed, startled at her excessive paleness.

Raising the window, she seized a handful of snow and rubbed it violently against her cheeks. The artificial bloom produced made her for the moment a picture to behold. But the color soon fled from her cheeks, leaving them more deadly white than ever. The next instant, and Lieutenant Rolfe's arm was supporting her gently to the door of the carriage in waiting.

They rode off—that merry trio—and, sickened at the heartlessness and vanity of the scene, I entered the house. It was about midnight, when a loud knock fell upon my ear. It roused me from my slumbers, for overcome by fatigue, I had fallen asleep in my chair over my work. I glanced at my watch; it was just twelve o'clock, and Charlotte would not, in all probability, return for at least three hours.

My mother had already anticipated me, and answered the summons. A hurried step upon the staircase, and the chamber door quickly opened, revealing the pale and anxious countenance of Edward Manners. His coming was unlooked for, as a telegraphic despatch, received from him that morning, informed us of his intention to be with us on the following day.

Edward Manners glanced first at the vacant couch, and then bent an inquiring look upon me as I stood pale and trembling there before him, Charlotte's bridal dress, upon which I had been sewing, still in my hands. I felt that a thorough explanation was necessary. My sister, in going to the ball that evening, had felt perfectly safe, inasmuch as her lover would not probably return until the next day, and she had cunningly extorted a promise of secrecy in the affair upon my part. I could not feel it in my heart to deceive him by uttering an untruth; while, on the other side, I had pledged my word to Charlotte that I would on no condition betray her. My mother, fearful of being interrogated concerning the matter, had cautiously crept away to bed. I alone was left to bear the perhaps lasting displeasure of that deeply injured man.

When, therefore, he questioned me closely upon the subject of Charlotte's strange absence, I begged that he would excuse me for not answering him, as I had promised not to disclose anything relative to the subject, should it be demanded of me. I saw the cloudy and troubled look which settled upon the brow of my friend, as he rose to depart. From the bottom of my heart I pitied him. A few minutes dread silence, and Edward Manners took his hat and left the room. I accompanied him to the porch door, but he had hardly gained the first step, when the carriage drove up, containing Lieutenant Rolfe and Charlotte.

The former sprang from the coach and gracefully assisted his fair but exhausted companion to alight. A tender adieu from the infatuated man, and a merry "good night" from Nellie Griffith, and the carriage drove rapidly off. At this moment, Edward Manners stepped boldly forth from the shadow of the cottage, where he had temporarily screened himself from observation, and stood quiet and motionless before the eyes of the terrified girl.

A quick, sharp cry rang out upon the stillness of the night, and Charlotte Wilton, making a desperate effort to reach the house, fell fainting upon the hall floor. In my fright, I called for Edward; but he answered not, and lifting my sister's senseless form in my arms, I at last made out to convey her to her bed, where, by the aid of restoratives, my mother and I finally succeeded in awakening the conscience-stricken Charlotte to a state of sensibility.

Five years passed—bringing with them, in their rapid flight, more of sorrow than of joy to my sad and weary heart. The morning succeeding the night of the fatal ball, my sister had received a note from her deeply offended lover, in which he released her from an engagement no longer agreeable to the hearts of both parties, and also bade her a last farewell. There were no bitter reproaches, no words spoken in scorn or anger, contained in that brief epistle. What were his future intentions, or whither he went, no one knew—the only bit of intelligence gained concerning him, being the fact of his departure from Boston.

Six months after the events related above, my sister Charlotte became the wife of Lieutenant Rolfe. To Paris, gay and dazzling Paris, the proud and apparently happy husband took his young bride. The cold which she had contracted on the night of her rash exposure, never left her. Bewildered by the bright and tempting scenes in the midst of which she was placed, Charlotte Rolfe led for three long years a constant life of dissipation.

During this period, my mother died suddenly, leaving me alone with my great sorrow, and separated thousands of miles from the only near relative I possessed on earth—my twin sister. Hearing but seldom from my light-hearted and giddy sister, I still continued my labors as assistant teacher in the academy at Lindenwood. One day, however, there came a letter penned with trembling fingers, and bearing the Paris post-mark.

With a beating heart, I broke it open. It was from Charlotte. Led away by the intoxicating pleasures of the gaming-table, Lieutenant Rolfe had at first neglected, then abandoned his fair wife to despair and sickness. All my old love for her revived, as I read that painfully sad letter, and freely I forgave her former wrongs and injustice towards me in past years—years now to be banished from the tablet of memory.

It was but the work of a few days to resign my situation, and set sail for Europe. Arriving in Paris, I found Charlotte slowly wasting away in consumption. About her, still lingered a few remnants of former splendor. But Paris, with its noise and bustle, was not a fitting place for the last days of an invalid to be spent. To sunny Italy I bore her, where its soft breezes kissed her pale cheek, and finally lulled her to sleep upon its gentle breast. From the moment of my arrival in Paris, Charlotte would suffer no other person to attend her. For a number of days before she died, her mind seemed constantly stung by remorse. Her nervousness and unrest annoyed me, and I besought her to pour into my sympathizing ear the cause of her distress.

Pillowling her fair head upon my breast, she told me of the love which Edward Manners had felt for me in years gone by, and how, serpent-like, she had first dazzled him by her superior beauty, and then crept into his affections. Her only motive in feigning love for the true and noble hearted artist had been to wrest him from the embraces of another. Her past life she now looked back upon with sorrow and regret. She believed her rare beauty to have been the one great curse of her life, the bane of her very existence. In tones of deep penitence Charlotte begged my forgiveness, and only desired to live, in order that she might some day restore the wronged and banished one to my arms once more.

For a few moments we mingled our tears together in silence, which was only broken by the violent coughing of my poor and anguish-stricken sister. I proposed returning her to her couch, thinking that she might then feel herself more comfortable. But no! she desired to still rest in my arms, and so I pressed her slight form closer to my breast, while soothed by my tenderness, she fell into what I believed was a gentle and refreshing slumber. Alas, it was her last and final sleep! for a half hour later, I still held to my own warm and pulsating heart the lifeless body of my still beautiful twin sister.

"This way, Signor Morelli, if you please," said a kind friend of mine residing at the same hotel, as he ushered his companion, a tall and dark looking man, into the chamber of death, where in the evening twilight I sat with my face buried in my hands, beside an open window.

Feeling it was almost impossible to remove the remains of my sister to America where I had determined to still make my home, I had expressed a desire to procure a bust of Charlotte before leaving Florence, and had accordingly been recommended to secure the services of the previously mentioned gentleman, whose fame as a sculptor was pre-eminent in the "City of Flowers." I heard their low whispers as they approached the couch where my sister lay clothed in the snowy habiliments of death. I did not uncover my eyes until a low moan fell upon my ear, and a voice in my own native tongue exclaimed: "Great God! it is Charlotte!"

"Who are you, sir?" I cried, advancing towards the sculptor, who, overpowered with emotion, now grasped the pillar of the bedstead for support.

"A friend, lady, whose memory you have doubtless learned to loathe."

I gazed at that dark and sorrowing face. Those tones so rich and low, whose music still vibrated in my ear, were not to be mistaken. With a wild cry that echoed strangely throughout that abode of death, I sprang into the arms of the stranger, and was passionately clasped to the heart of the once humble artist—Edward Manners—to the surprise of my friend, who stood gazing upon the scene before him with an air of utter astonishment.

The history of my prodigal lover is soon told. Finding his confidence and love betrayed by Charlotte Wilton, he had at once left America for Europe. While wandering through Italy in search of employment, his rare genius chanced to attract the notice of Moselli, a wealthy sculptor of Florence, who, pleased with the degree of enthusiasm manifested by Edward for his chosen profession, at once took him into his studio as a pupil, and on his death he bequeathed to him his entire property, on condition that he should assume his family name, and still pursue his art.

In a retired street of Florence, overlooking the beautiful Arno, is situated a large and cheerful studio. In the middle of the room sits my dear husband, busily engaged upon a statue of Canova. In a cosy little nook I laid this little romance of our lives, entitled "My Sister and I." Two miniature babes named Edward and Charlotte, sport at my feet, and pause now and then from their joyous play, to ask me to take them to aunty's grave, whose unhappy fate is unknown to their young hearts, though indelibly stamped upon the minds of their forgiving parents. Peace to her ashes!

THE OAK TREE IN THE GLEN.

BY WHITE MOUNTAIN LILIE.

I stood beneath its branches,
One lonely autumn day,
And watched the gorgeous colors
Of the sunset fade away.
Far on the distant hill-tops,
With many a massive fold,
The crimson clouds reflected
The dying sunbeams gold.

The lengthening shadows warned me
That eve had come again;
But still I lingered sadly,
'Neath the oak tree in the glen.
There, in silence all unbroken,
Save by the murmurs low
Of the Saco's crystal waters,
That ever onward flow.

I lingered in the quiet
Of the dawning eventide,
And heard the rippling eddies
O'er smooth-worn pebbles glide.
All day had memory wandered,
Unawed by hopes and fears,
Back through the tear-dimmed vista
Of long forgotten years.

And now came stealing o'er me,
Like some half-forgotten strain
Of olden, much loved music,
I ne'er might hear again;
Sad memories of the loved ones,
Who in the days bygone,
Had watched with me the sunset hues,
Till every ray had gone.

And musing there, I wondered,
If in the far-off clime,
Where his footsteps now had wandered,
He e'er recalled the time,
When, 'neath the leafy branches
Of the oak tree in the glen,
We two had parted, never,
Perehance, to meet again.

Glad were the memories awakened,
Of the happy, joyous past;
The day dream of existence,
All, all too bright to last.
But sadder thoughts came o'er me,
Of the future, drear and cold,
And I sighed to reach that haven,
Where the heart can ne'er grow old.

From out the starry heavens
The moon shone bright and clear;
As I turned to leave the grassy dell,
That memory held so dear,
A footfall woke the echoes,
That slumbered in the glen;
A voice whispered, "Agnes,"
And we had met again.

Long years have fled forever,
With those that went before,

But the joy of that meeting
Dwells with me evermore;
And when I seek the shadows
Of the oak tree in the glen,
My heart beats high with rapture,
For he is with me then.

A CRUEL HOAX.

A trick which has none to parallel it, was contrived by the late Theodore Hook and Henry H—, formerly of Brazen-nose College, with Mr. Barham, author of the "Ingoldsby Legends." It may not be unacceptable to many of our readers to know some particulars of this prodigious and completely successful imposition, which took place on November 26, 1810. The subject of it was most unfairly a very respectable lady in Berners Street (it was said of the name of 'Tottenham'), but the situation being central was considered to have led to the spot being determined upon. Very early in the morning wagons, some with coals and others with furniture from upholsterers, began to arrive, as well as hearses with coffins, and trains of funeral coaches; also tribes of professional men of every imaginable class. At noon the Right Honorable Joshua Jonathan Smith, the lord mayor, with full equipage drove up, "to take affidavit of the lady, who from illness could not attend at the Mansion House." Six stout men bearing an organ; cartloads of wine; drays with beer; carpet manufacturers, coach and clock makers, curiosity dealers, and, in short, agents and tradesmen of every denomination, were made dupes of, and in the rear almost a myriad of servants "wanting places" helped to increase the crowd. The unfortunate victims of this dupery were so impacted together that they were unable to make their escape, and were compelled for many hours to endure the gibes and jeers of the unpitiful mob. Till late at night the whole neighborhood was a scene of confusion beyond description.—Notes and Queries.

LETTER FROM A BOARDING-SCHOOL MISS.

"DEAR MAE,—I am now being taught the Spanesh language! wich my Tutor says I learn it with grate fasility, ive improved amasinly in the english sints ive been here! i speke and rite the real new stile now? and my composishons are being wery much admired among the pupils of the school, I come within won of getting the medle for bein the best english schotar, at the clothes of the last quarter, and i shoood a done it, but! I was Bein sick a bedd and couldn't attend to my studies—for a hole week! and so I got beehyndand: by the buy, Mar! (whst shoking bad english you do right?) ime ashamed to sho yewr letters to any of the missesses among my akwaintances for instents you sa wile the te wotter was bileing the other day, ecceterah and so forth now yew shoould 'say wile the te wotter was bein bilie—par too? rites jus as inkorrektly for instents he says in his leter french guds are falling verry fast insted of saving french goods are being fell. ime reeally shocked that you and hee don't keep paice with the march of moderna improvement but time being called this minuit to excite my spanesh lesson, so i must wind orf. I supperscribe myself your affectionate dawtar, MIRANDA MACKEREL."

Curious Matters.

An old Building.

The Marblehead Bank is kept in the venerable mansion of Col. Lee, built in 1762. A few days ago, during a heavy rain, it was noticed that the pavement in front of the house was laid with the date of 1768 represented in small white stones. For ninety years the stones have been daily travelled over, yet nobody had noticed the chronological mosaic under their feet, until a careful soul looking down for the driest place to put his foot, happened to discover it. The building is still in good repair. The house is an interesting relic of old times. The entire woodwork, inside, including the doors, window cases, stair banisters and ceiling, is of solid mahogany. A remarkable feature about the building is, that the same paper is upon the walls in every room that was put on them when the house was built. The paper is of the most ancient and picturesque character. In the reception room where were received Gen. Washington, Lafayette, and other distinguished heroes of the Revolution, the carving of the wood is magnificent.

Discovery of a Chest of Old Coins.

The Court Journal has the following: A most extraordinary discovery, which, for obvious reasons, is sought to be kept a profound secret, has taken place in an old ruined house at Iriel. An immense chest, full of gold and silver coins of English stamp, has been found concealed in one of the cellars, where it had been carefully walled up. From the papers and documents contained likewise in the chest, it has become evident that the house was once inhabited by Bollingbroke, who must have lain concealed here during the period wherein his whereabouts has always remained a puzzle to biographers and historians. In one of his letters, he mentions that "his retreat is convenient to the Seine." And the house in question is found to possess a subterranean passage leading down to the water's edge. The money is evidently the result of the subscription raised by the party of the Pretender, for want of which the latter was prevented from striking a decisive blow.

Imitation Pearls.

At a soiree at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, Mr. Quekett exhibited some very interesting specimens illustrating the manner in which pearls were produced naturally, and the manner in which the production might be artificially imitated. He showed that the oyster-shell was first perforated from without by a boring-worm, and when the inner layer is reached, this layer is pushed inwards, covered with lustrous coating of the shell, and at length detached. The introduction of wires and other foreign bodies from without imitating the action of the borer, and the body became coated or plated with the pearly layer. This is doubtless important in a commercial point of view.

A queer Title-Page.

There was published in London, in 1768, a discourse which was delivered before the unshapely prince of Orange. The title-page of the pamphlet squints round the corner at the character of the work, thus: "The Deformity of Sin cured; a Sermon preached at St. Michael's, Crooked Lane, before the Prince of Orange, by the Rev. J. Crookshanks. Sold by M. Denton, at the Crooked Billet near Cripplegate." The text was, "Every crooked path shall be made straight."

Pressure upon Fish.

Mr. Fell, in his late address to the American Institute on the subject of fish, says that at ninety-three feet below the surface of the water, a shad would be compelled to bear about the weight of sixty pounds to every square inch on the surface of its body; at three hundred and sixty-one feet, one hundred and eighty-one pounds; at six hundred and six feet, two hundred and eighty-six pounds; at four thousand two hundred and six feet, eighteen hundred and thirty-one pounds to the square inch; at six thousand feet, over one ton. Whales sometimes descend into the depths of the ocean four thousand nine hundred feet, when they sustain considerably over the enormous weight of two hundred thousand tons—nearly, if not quite, one hundred and thirty-eight tons to each square foot of surface exposed. The fish do not, of course, feel this pressure, as it is exerted on all portions of their bodies alike.

Coincidence.

It is worthy of note, that Dr. Franklin, the great pioneer in the investigation of the nature and properties of electricity, who first attempted to reduce it to a science, and who proved the identity of lightning and electricity, and Professor Morse the inventor of the electric telegraph, were both Massachusetts men, and what is more remarkable, they were born within a mile and a half of each other—one in Boston, the other over the river in Charlestown. Cyrus W. Field, the agent of the Trans-Atlantic Telegraph Company, the efficient man of the concern, who has done more than any other man to bring about the connection of the continents by telegraphic wires, is also a Massachusetts man, a native, we believe, of Athol, in Worcester county. It is not often that such a coincidence can be found in connection with a matter of so great moment to the interests of civilization and humanity.

Extraordinary Suicide by Starvation.

It is stated that Mr. Jacob Plant, 36 years of age, died at Manchester, in this State, of voluntary starvation. Mr. Plant was paying attention to a young lady of that town some three years ago, but his proposal for marriage was rejected. The disappointment preyed upon his mind, and he soon afterward attempted to blow his brains out, but only succeeded in destroying both eyes. He has consequently remained blind for three years. During that time he once made an attempt to starve himself, but without success. The second time he was successful—meeting his end as above stated. He had partaken of nothing for nine weeks but coffee, sweetened water and morphine—finding his chief sustenance during that time from the fat of his system.

Marrying One's Step-daughter.

By a curious concatenation of circumstances one Thomas Galloway, formerly of Vermont, and now of Wheeling, Va., married his step-daughter. While he was busy whaling, she, left to herself by the death of her mother, became a fine young woman, went off west, got married and became a widow. Thomas returning from his whaling happened in the town where the widow resided, saw her, did not recognize her as his step-child and married her. After the marriage his wife's account of her early life revealed the relationship, but it made no difference to Thomas, for he took possession of some fine property left him by his brother, who was drowned in the Ohio, and happy in his married state, he is now a respectable member of society.

Effects of a Paper Pattern.

A gentleman who was ill of a low, nervous fever, accompanied by fits of mental aberration, would lie in his bed, with his eyes fixed intently upon the opposite wall, continually muttering to himself—"Fourteen up, thirty-three across—fourteen up, thirty-three across." Notwithstanding the best medical advice, and every other effort that was made for his recovery, he still continued to lie in the same dreamy state, uttering the same words. At length it struck the physician that the incessant repetition of these words must be connected with some image presented to the mind through the eye. And it further occurred to him that the paper of the room might afford a solution. The pattern of the paper consisted of lozenge-shaped figures, which followed each other at regular intervals. On counting these the physician found that the number exactly tallied with the patient's ceaseless refrain, namely, fourteen lozenges from the floor to the ceiling, and thirty-three from one end of the room to the other. Acting upon this discovery, he immediately ordered the removal of the patient to another room, where the paper was of a totally different pattern. This was done while the patient was asleep, and when he awoke he commenced mechanically with "fourteen," but suddenly stopped, looked puzzled, and then smiled. From that moment he never uttered the old burden, his recovery came gradually and slowly, and he finally became convalescent. This gentleman used afterwards to relate that he had an indistinct recollection of certain figures which commenced with the lozenge form, but afterwards assumed a variety of shapes and colors, never, however, losing the identity of number, namely, fourteen up and thirty-three across.

A Queer Fish.

There is a large fish found all along the coast of Europe called the Lophius Piscator, so large and unwieldy that it is forced to resort to stratagem to secure its food. This fish is furnished with a set of filaments over its body, which, when kept in motion, resemble little worms wriggling in the water. The lophius, when it needs a meal, settles and conceals itself in the weeds and mud at the bottom of the sea, thus hiding every part of its body except the worm-like filaments that fringe its surface. By agitating these, shoals of little fish soon gather around and nibble at the bait. When a number are thus collected, the lophius opens its huge jaws, and with a sudden gulp, sucks in the little fish. The trap is set again and again, until the sly old lophius gets his fill, and swarms of little fish are taken in.

A Wager.

Capt. John Travis, the champion pistol shot, has had manufactured by Morgan James—the great gun man of Utica, New York—a pistol, the like of which has never before been seen. It has never yet been tried; but Travis has such confidence in his own nerve, and the "pistol holding up," he is willing to give a half a dollar for every shot at a barrel of flour half a mile off, provided he can have the flour when he hits it!

Remarkable Incident.

The Etoile Belge states that not long since, as the clergyman was reciting the usual prayers over the coffin of a child, feeble cries were heard, and the coffin was opened, when the child was found alive and life like. It was taken to the hospital and finally recovered.

Instinct of Animals.

In 1806, previous to an earthquake at Naples, which took place in the night, but was most severely felt in the provinces, the oxen and cows began to bellow; the sheep and goats bleated strangely; the dogs howled terribly; and the horses fastened in their stalls leaped up, endeavoring to break the halters which attached them to the mangers. Rabbits and moles were seen to leave their burrows; birds rose, as if scared, from the places on which they had alighted; and reptiles left in clear daylight their subterranean retreats. Some faithful dogs, a few minutes before the first shock awoke their sleeping masters by barking and pulling them, as if anxious to warn them of impending danger; and several persons were thus enabled to save themselves. On the recent occasion all the dogs in the neighborhood of Vallo howled before the people were sensible of their danger. To account for these circumstances it is conjectured that, prior to actual disturbance, noxious gases and other exhalations are emitted from the interior of the earth through crannies and pores of the surface, invisible to the eye, which distress and alarm animals gifted with acute organs of smell.

Sagacity of a Horse.

The Whitehaven (Eng.) Herald says: While a chestnut horse was coming down Rosemary lane with a load of alabaster, where a number of children were at play, one of them, about three or four years old, ran in before the horse, and the sagacious creature, instead of passing over it, lifted it up with his teeth, and placed it on the side of the road. The child's mother was close by at the time, and her feelings may better be imagined than described. The name of the animal is Captain, but the title should be advanced a step or two higher.

The Head of the Fish.

A most curious fact was communicated to me the other day by one of Edinburgh's brightest ornaments, and who, like many men of genius, has a natural turn for angling. A question was proposed to a party of mathematicians—"of what shape a solid body ought to be to pass through a fluid with the least possible resistance?" By application of the strictest mathematical principles it was solved, and the form discovered coincided exactly with that of a fish's head!

An Old Bachelor's Epitaph.

Among the many ancient tombstones in the "Pawtucket Cemetery," at Haverhill, Mass., is one from which the following inscription is copied:

JOHN SWOODPOCK.
Died February 13, 1707-8,
and in ye 76 year of his age.
He lived honestly all his life
Died aged and never had a wife.

Remarkable Discovery.

A murderer at Antwerp, having left his boots on the scene of his crime, a photograph and description of these articles were sent round to all the neighboring shoemakers. At length one of them came forward, and recognized the boots as made by him for an individual whom he described, and who was already in custody on suspicion. This led to other proof, which incontestably fixed the crime on the prisoner and an associate.

The Florist.

Now the cold, autumnal dews are seen
To cobweb every green;
And by the low shorn rowans doth appear
The fast declining year — FRANCIS QUARLES.

Bulbous-rooted Plants.

Many of this class of plants vegetate and bloom during the autumn, winter and spring months. At whatever season of the year a bulb vegetates, it should be allowed a moist soil; but very little water should be applied until it has shot up an inch or two; thus water should be given freely, and increased in quantity as the plant grows. When in full bloom the water may be lessened in a slight degree, taking care, however, to keep the soil constantly moist, in order to enjoy the beauty of the flower. As soon as it is out of bloom, water must be freely given and increased in quantity, in order to enable the leaves to become matured, and the exhausted bulb to become thereby re-established. Upon the growth of the leaves, after the bulbous-rooted plants have bloomed, depends the formation of the flower bud for the ensuing year.

Tan.

When tan is received by the gardeners from the tan-pits, it is generally wet and without heat; but after it has lain in a pile in an open shed for two or three weeks, and turned over two or three times, it becomes drier, and begins to ferment, when heat is evolved in a greater or less degree according to the size of the mass. In this state it is fit to be introduced into pits or beds in hot-houses for the purpose of supplying bottom heat. For ordinary purposes the bed or layer of tan need not be thicker than eighteen inches or a foot, but when a very powerful heat is required, double that thickness is desirable. The pots in which the plants are contained if large should only be settled in the tan about half their depth, and even in some cases rest on top. After the first violent heat has subsided, they may be plunged to the brim.

Humea.

Elegant biennial plants, which should be sown in a slight hot bed in the spring, then potted off and kept in the open air during summer, and in the green-house in the winter, to be finally planted in the open border in May the second year. If the plants are re-potted three or four times during the course of the first summer, always into only a little larger pots, they will become so much stronger before they are finally planted out, as amply to repay the additional trouble.

Helium.

Viper's Bugloss. Perennial and biennial, and annual plants of great beauty, generally with rich dark blue flowers; though some kinds that are natives of the Cape of Good Hope and the Canaries, have red, white or violet flowers. They all require a light soil, and will grow well in either sandy or peaty loam; they are easily propagated by seeds or division of the root.

Goats-Beard.

This plant, called also maisty and oyster-plant, will not uncloze its flowers in cloudy weather. From its habit of closing its flowers at noon it has received the common name of "Go-to-bed-at-noon," and in many districts of England the farmers' boys are said to regulate their dinner hour by the closing of the goats-beard.

Light.

Light is as essential as earth and water to plants, and without an abundance of light, plants are neither vigorous in themselves nor properly colored. When green-house plants are kept in imperfectly lighted plant-houses or half-darkened rooms, it is really painful to witness the efforts they make to catch as much light as they possibly can; their stems become weak, from being unnaturally elongated, or drawn up and twisted, in their efforts to reach the light, and their flowers are pale and of very little value. In those towns where the atmosphere is thickened by coal smoke, the light never has the same beneficial effect as in the open country, where there is nothing to prevent it from exercising its full influence over the plants.

Chinese Rose.

Rosa indica, the Chinese or monthly rose, is the parent of a large family of exquisite roses, comprising upwards of two hundred varieties and hybrids, the most interesting of which are the tea-scented roses, and the noisettes. The tea-scented roses are delicate little plants, with large drooping flowers, and they are supposed to be hybrids between the common and the yellow Chinese roses; they are very tender, and require to be raised against a south wall on a raised border, composed of equal parts of vegetable mould, light loam and sand. Many cultivators take up these roses in October, and keep the roots in pots in a green-house till spring, when they are again set out, which is far better than trying to protect them during the winter.

Clipping.

Some gardeners do not clip their box edgings till the month, when they clip with shears; but this is a bad practice, as the leaves which have been injured by the shears, retain the marks till the following May; and weak plants are frequently killed, or the lower part of their stalks rendered bare, and they will remain so ever afterwards, and the beauty of the edging is then gone completely. The best time for clipping box is, about the end of June; after which, especially if well watered, the box makes a second shoot of half an inch, or an inch, which obliterates the marks of the shears.

Dwarf Roses.

Roses deteriorate when left to themselves or to inferior culture. In order to remedy this, no renewal or change of situation is necessary, but a careful taking up at the proper seasons, good manuring, and careful replanting. Plants neglected, and which have been stationary for a number of years, may experience some checks on such translating; but when it becomes annual, the reverse is the case, and increased luxuriance the invariable result. When pegging down the shoots, so as to cover the entire bed or border, is practised, this treatment will not apply.

Camellias.

The camellia is a plant which requires abundance of water, and is yet soon killed by suffering stagnant moisture to remain about the roots. When grown in pots, there should be abundance of drainage; that is, the pots should be nearly a quarter filled with potsherds. The soil should be peat-earth, and sand, which may be mixed with a little vegetable mould, if it is desired to have the plants of very luxuriant growth; and the plants should be pitted high, so as to let the collar of the plant be quite above the rim of the pot.

Tender Exotic Plants.

In rearing plants of this character, in hot-houses, the pots are filled in the ordinary way, the finest loam being placed at the top. The seeds are sown thin or thickly, according to the nature of the plant. Some vegetate sooner by being soaked two or three hours in water. They require a smart bottom heat to start them. When they are far advanced enough to be fit to handle, the plants should be put singly into pots of the smallest size, and again plunged in the heat. Attention should be paid not to over-pot them—that is, placing them in too large pots. Small pots, to which air has free access on all sides, are found to forward plants better than larger pots. Plants so placed require frequent shifting, it is true; but this is in their favor if quick growth be desirable.

Harebell.

It is rather curious, that though few poets can write a sonnet without mentioning the Harebell, and though it is sure to be introduced in every eloquent prose description of country scenery, botanists cannot exactly decide what plant is meant by the name—some supposing it to be the beautiful little blue Campanula rotundifolia, and others the wild Hyacinth, Scilla non scripta. The fact is, both plants are known by the name; but as the original word is said to have been "air-bell," it is most probable that it was the campanula that was first so designated, and that it is alluded to by the poets; as the tender blue of its flowers is so near the color of the skies.

Melia.

The Bead Tree. The common Bead Tree is a half hardy shrub or tree, with lilac flowers and yellow berries, the pulp of which is poisonous; but the hard stone in the centre is used to make rosaries. There is another species, commonly called the Indian Lilac, or Pride of India. Both kinds require stove heat, and the seeds will then ripen. It will grow best in loam and peat, and it is propagated quite easily by cuttings.

Creeping Cereus.

A succulent plant, with long, round, pendant stems, beautiful pink flowers and dark purple, eatable fruit. They require green-house heat, and should be grown in loam mixed with pounded brick, lime and rubbish, in pots well drained with cinders. They require abundance of air and light.

Cedar of Goa.

A very ornamental half-hardy tree, which in a sheltered situation has a beautiful effect on a lawn, from its drooping branches and glossy foliage. It requires a light soil, and to be occasionally watered, as its roots are very apt to wither if suffered to become too dry.

Tortula.

Wall-moss. A kind of moss very useful in making moss houses, from the brightness of its colors; some species being a dark-blue green, others a rich yellowish green, others a pale pea green, and one a dark rich brown. They are all rather rare here.

Gentianella.

This dark and lovely plant is said to "open its blue eyes to greet the mid-day sun, but to close its petals against the approach of a shower."

Scitamineæ.

Hot-house plants with reed-like stems, long, broad leaves and showy flowers, which are usually very fragrant.

How to Manure Trees.

Very few persons manure trees growing in sod or grass land, in a judicious or economical manner. The general practice is to dig the manure in, within a diameter of six feet, having the body for the centre. The tree takes its food from the young rootlets, whose mouths extend just as far on every side as the branches of the trees; hence, this manure, applied close to the body of the tree, is not where the roots take it up, and, of course, but little of its value is absorbed by the tree. If you doubt it, just try the experiment on two trees. Serve the one as above named, and the other, as follows:—Mark a circle around the tree, having for its outline the exact radius formed by the overhanging branches; dig on the inner side of this circle a trench two feet wide, and one foot deep; mix well-rooted manure half and half with the best of the soil or earth dug out of this trench, and fill the trench with it; then replace the turf, and wheel away the refuse, or extra earth; rake clean and smooth; you will have a good growth of tree; your fruit large and more fair, and no unsightly hillock or mound around the body of the tree.

Earth Worms.

The common earth worm is a very destructive creature in flower pots. It has been ascertained that worms swallow earthy matter, and that, after having deprived it of its nourishing qualities, eject it. To find fresh earth, the worm is continually incited to penetrate the ground in different directions; and, after each repast, returns to the surface to eject its cast. Thus the ground inhabited by worms is sure to be thoroughly perforated and pulverized. In a field this has a good effect, as it serves to lighten the soil, and render it pervious to the air and rain; but in a pot, every passage of the worms tears asunder the roots of the plants, which are pressed close together, and thus does serious injury.

Double Flowers.

Double flowers are particularly desirable to cultivate, both in the garden and parlor, not only from their beauty, but from the comparative certainty which exists of their producing their flowers every year, the plant not being weakened by ripening seed. This is peculiarly the case in double flowering shrubs and trees—the double flowered peach, the double-flowered cherry, and the double flowered hawthorn, never failing to produce abundance of blossoms as long as the trees continue in health; while the single flowered kinds fall every second or third year.

Beds of Hyacinths.

October is the best month to plant out bulbs of all kinds, but especially hyacinth bulbs. Plant the bulbs six inches deep, and round the top of the bed in such a manner that the rain may run off, as too much wet will cause the bulbs to rot. To protect them from too much wet during the winter, the beds may be covered with reeds or thatch, in a manner to throw off the rain. Thus treated, the plants will bloom with great vigor and beauty.

"Go Marry."

The most beautiful flowers are those which are double, such as double pinks, double roses, and double dahlias. What an argument is this against the chilling deformity of single blessedness! "Go marry!" is written on everything beautiful that the eye rests upon, beginning with the birds of paradise and ending with apple-blossoms.

The Housewife.

To cleanse and prevent the Hair falling off.

Take two large handfuls of rosemary leaves, a piece of common soda about the size of a hazel nut, and a drachm of camphor. Put it in a jug, pour on it a quart of boiling water, and cover it closely to keep the steam in. Let it stand for twelve hours, then strain it, and add a wine-glass of rum. It is then ready for use. If the hair falls off much, the wash ought to be applied to the roots, with a piece of sponge every other day, taking care to wet the skin thoroughly. Then rub dry with a towel, brush well, and use only as much pomade as will keep down the short hairs, as the wash makes the hair soft and glossy. This will keep good for several months in bottles well corked, and a piece of camphor in each.

To cure a Burn.

Take a tablespoonful of lard, half a tablespoonful of spirits of turpentine, a piece of rosin as big as a hickory-nut (of the walnut kind—a trifle larger than a large nutmeg), and simmer them together until melted. It makes a salve, which, when cold, may be applied to a linen cloth, and lay it over the burn. If immediately wanted, spread it on a cloth as soon as melted, it will very soon cool. It has been applied after the corroding effects of chemical poison, after a foot has been burnt by boiling sugar, after severe scalds; and in every case the sufferer obtained perfect ease in ten or fifteen minutes after it was used. It may be applied two or three times a day, or as often as the cloth becomes dry.

Pork Outlets.

Cut them from a small delicate kin of pork; bone, and trim them neatly; fry them a light brown; put into a small stewpan a little vinegar, and eschalet chopped very finely, two table-spoonsful of tomato-sauce, and sufficient brown gravy to make it tasty; stew the outlets in the sauce five minutes, and send to table dish'd handsomely. If the outlets are broiled, they may be dipped in yolk of egg and bread-crumbs, and broiled over a clear fire, and served with tomato-sauce or sauce Robert.

Black Cake.

Dissolve a teaspoonful of pearlash in a little new milk, and set it by in a warm place. Then cream one pound of butter, and add to it two pounds of flour, nine eggs (well beaten), and one pint of molasses. Beat the whole well together, and then add a wineglassful of brandy, and a teacupful of sweet cream.

Another Black Cake.

One pound of sugar, one quart of molasses, six eggs, one teacupful of ginger, one cupful of cream, half a pound of butter, two teaspoonsful of saleratus, with fruit and spices to your liking. Mix like pound cake, and bake in the same way.

Dover Cake.

One pound of sugar, half a pound of butter, one pound of flour, six eggs, half a pint of cream, a teaspoonful of soda, and the flavor you most prefer. Three-quarters of a pound of raisins or currants are an improvement.

York Cake.

One pound of sugar, one pint of molasses, two cupfuls of lard or butter, one pint of sweet milk, four eggs, two teaspoonsful of saleratus, cinnamon and ginger to your liking, and enough flour to form a good cake dough.

To cure a Felon.

When you fear a felon is coming, put a pint tin of boiling water on the stove; then add to that a teaspoonful of saleratus and a wineglass of vinegar; heat this every little while, say from half an hour to an hour, and hold your finger in it till the pain subsides; repeat this till you see the matter all drawn to one place; then have it opened, and your finger will heal. A doctor ought to open it if possible, as the skin is always thickened over a felon. They have been cured in twenty-four hours with this.

Pot Pie.

Make paste with suet chopped fine; cut the paste in strips, and arrange at the bottom of a pie-dish; put a layer of fowl (nicely carved and seasoned), then a layer of potatoes, pared and cut in halves, then another layer of paste, another of fowl, and another of potatoes; last of all, at the top, a layer of paste (this should always be arranged in strips crossways); add a teacupful of water, and let it come to the boil once, and be put to simmer gently for an hour and a half.

To wash fine Crochet Lace.

Cover a glass bottle with calico or linen, and then tack the lace smoothly upon it, rub it with soap and cover it with calico. Boil it for twenty minutes in soft water; let it all dry together, and the lace will be found to be ready for use. A long piece of lace must be wound round and round the bottle, the edge of each round a little above the last, and a few stitches to keep it firm at the beginning and end, will be found sufficient.

To take Grease Spots out of Papered Walls.

With a piece of flannel, dipped in spirits of wine, go carefully over the injured parts once (or twice if very bad), when the spots will be entirely erased from the paper, which will look as well as ever.

To clean White Feathers.

Wash them well in soft water, with white soap and blue; rub them through very clean, white paper, beat them on the paper, shake them before the fire, dry them in the air, and afterward curl them.

Queen Cake.

One pound of butter—well worked, and one pound of sugar. Beat the butter and eggs together to a cream; beat ten eggs very light, and add them in by degrees. Mix in one pound of flour sifted fine.

German Household Vinegar.

Take seven gallons and a half of soft water, and two pounds of honey or brown sugar; two ounces of cream of tartar, and one gallon of corn spirits. Mix well, and cool, and keep it lightly covered in a warm place.

Yankee Cake.

The ingredients are: one teacupful of butter, two cupfuls of sugar, four eggs, three cupfuls of bread dough, two teaspoonsful of soda (dissolved) four teaspoonsful of cream of tartar, and whatever essence you prefer.

Composition Cake.

One pound of flour, one pound of sugar, half a pound of butter, seven eggs, half a pint of cream, and a gill of brandy.

Eyelashes.

The mode adopted by the beauties of the East to increase the length and strength of their eyelashes is simply to clip the split ends with a pair of scissors about once a month. Mothers perform the operation on their children, both male and female, when they are mere infants, watching the opportunity whilst they sleep; the practice never fails to produce the desired effect. We recommend it to the attention of our fair readers, as a safe and innocent means of enhancing the charms which so many of them, no doubt, already possess.

To remove Dust or Mud from a Dress.

Take a small broom-orn whisk and (having shaken the dress) brush it carefully between the plaits or gathers. If there is mud on the skirt, rub it off with a piece of stout worsted stuff formed into a roll; or with a clean coarse towel. A plush-block is an excellent thing for brushing silk or merino dresses. To make it, get a small square block of wood, and sew tightly all over it (in the manner of a pincushion) a covering of saddler's plush.

Meringue Rice Pudding.

One teacup of rice boiled soft in milk; a pint of milk; a piece of butter the size of an egg; the yolks of five eggs; the rind of two lemons grated; bake twenty minutes. Beat the whites of the eggs to a strong froth, with two table-spoonful of white sugar; add the juice of the lemons; spread this over the pudding, and set it back in the oven to harden and brown lightly. Sago or tapioca puddings may be made in the same way.

Ginger Beer.

One and a half ounces of well sliced ginger, one ounce of cream of tartar, one lemon sliced, one pound of white sugar. Put the ingredients in an earthen vessel and pour on them one gallon of boiling water; when cold, add a table-spoonful of yeast, and let the whole stand until the next morning; then skim and bottle it, and in three days it will be fit for use.

Good Hard Soap for common use.

Three pails of good soft-soap, one pound of borax, and two and a half quarts of salt; put in a kettle, and let it just boil; then set in a cool place over night; it will rise like tallow, and can be cut in pieces; the longer it is dried the better; it keeps the hands soft, and lasts well. Those who study economy will like it.

Cure for Flux.

Take four ounces of castor oil, two table-spoonful of pulverized gum-Arabic, two table-spoonful of pulverized gum kino, one teaspsoonful of laudanum; mix with one pint of warm water. shake well, and take a table-spoonful three times a day. We never knew this to fail in the most severe cases.

For Cough.

Take one table-spoonful of molasses, two teaspsoonful of castor-oil, one teaspsoonful of camphor, and one teaspsoonful of pargoric; take half a teaspsoonful frequently. This is of great service when children have symptoms of croup.

A good Tea-Cake.

Four eggs, two cups of sugar, one cup of butter, one cup of milk, half a nutmeg, one teaspsoonful of cream of tartar, one-half teaspsoonful of soda, flour enough to make the right consistence to bake.

Pastry.

Excellent paste for fruit or meat pies may be made with two-thirds of wheat flour, one-third of the flour of boiled potatoes, and some butter or dripping; the whole being brought to a proper consistence with warm water, and a small quantity of yeast added when lightness is desired. This will also make very pleasant cakes for breakfast, and may be made with or without spices, fruits, etc.

Candles.

Candles are sometimes troublesome to light. They will ignite instantly, if, when preparing them for the evening, you dip the top in spirits of wine, shortly before they are wanted. Light them always with a match, and do not hold them to the fire, as that will cause the tops to melt and drip. Always hold the match to the side of the wick, and not over the top.

For a Burn.

The first application to a burn should be sweet oil, putting it on immediately, till other remedies can be prepared. Cotton should never be applied. It increases the pain and inflammation. For a slight burn or scald, some raw potato scraped fine, and tied on the place (renewing it at intervals), is an excellent remedy, and a very agreeable one to the sufferer.

Sponges.

Sponges are of great use in various sorts of cleaning. They should in all houses be provided for the purpose. To keep them soft and white, wash them in warm water with a little tartaric acid in it, and then rinse them in cold water. Take care not to put in too much tartaric acid, as, if used to excess, it will corrode the sponge.

To bleach Skeleton Leaves.

Enclose them in a bandbox along with burning sulphur for the purpose of bleaching. It is well known that a red rose will turn white by being held over the fumes of a lighted brimstone match.

Cooking Vegetables.

All kinds of vegetables should be put into boiling water to cook. Every kind of vegetable, excepting green peas, should lie in cold water some time before cooking them.

Pint Cake.

One pint of dough, one teaspsoonful of sugar, one teaspsoonful of butter, three eggs, one teaspsoonful of pearlash, with the addition of some raisins and spices.

To curl Feathers.

Heat them gently before the fire, then, with the back of a knife applied to the feathers, they will be found to curl quickly and well.

Elder Flower Vinegar.

Take three ounces of elder leaves to each pint of vinegar; let it steep for a fortnight and strain it. Keep in half-pint bottles.

Seidlitz Powder.

Half a drachm of tartaric acid, two scruples carbonate of soda, one drachm of Rochelle salts, five grains of ginger powder.

To restore Peach-color when turning Red.

Salt of potash dissolved in water; place the ribbon on a clean table, apply the mixture with a sponge.]

Editor's Table.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

END OF THE YEAR:

The present number of "Ballou's Dollar Monthly" ends volume eight, and our next number will commence the new year, and volume nine. Now therefore is the time to subscribe, and ensure the next number, fresh and early, as soon as it comes from the press. Enclose us one dollar, and receive the work for a whole year. No person can dispute the truth of the line at the bottom of our first page. It is indeed the cheapest magazine in the world! Send, or hand in the numbers at our office, for the past year, and have them bound up into two volumes of six hundred pages each, with illuminated covers and in neat, uniform style, at a charge of only thirty-eight cents per volume. Let each subscriber try to send us at least one name in addition to his or her own, for the new year, and send in your subscription at once.

TRUE COURAGE.—Have the courage to show your respect for honesty, in whatever guise it appears; and your contempt for dishonesty and duplicity, by whomsoever exhibited.

A FRENCH BULL.—In an address to a French electoral community, the candidate stated that he had shed all his blood for his country, and was ready to shed it again!

AN AWKWARD PREDICAMENT.—Asking a gentleman after his wife, not knowing that she has eloped with a "distinguished foreigner" six months before.

A PUN-HATER.—According to the Post, a rabid hater of puns lately declared that every man who dared to pen a pun should be sent for punishment to the penitentiary.

A CLEAR TITLE.—A New Zealand chief maintained that he had a good title to his land, because he had eaten the former owner.

MISSING AND MIST.—"If you are lost in a fog, Brown, what are you most likely to be?" "Mist, of course," says Brown, and vanishes.

KEARNEY AND THE INDIANS.

Shortly after the close of the Mexican war, Kearney was in command of a detachment of troops sent by the overland route to California. The detachment was not very strong in point of numbers, but deemed sufficient to protect themselves from attacks by the Indians, and in addition they were accompanied by two field howitzers. After the troops had once fairly entered the Indian country, they were incessantly harassed by large bodies of mounted savages, who hovered in their rear, and improved every opportunity to pick off men. This annoyance was endured for several days; and whenever Kearney evinced a disposition to show fight, the red fiends, being mounted on fleet horses, were soon out of the range of the bullets of the men, but soon rallied again and continued their pursuit as usual. At length Kearney came to the conclusion that this species of amusement must be stopped, if he wanted to take his command safely through; and so, improving an opportunity when the Indians had become unusually bold and impudent, he formed his men in a square, and prepared to receive a charge from the foe. Fortunately the Indians accepted the challenge, and pressed down upon Kearney's little command, as though determined to annihilate them at one fell swoop, when suddenly, at the word, the column opened in front, and the two brass howitzers poured forth a volley of grape upon the advancing foe which made them reel and fall back, with the loss of some of their "braves," and several horses. The savages had never seen a cannon before, and the havoc it made among them so overawed them, that for the rest of Kearney's march he was not at all troubled by them. Subsequently it was understood that they acknowledged Kearney to be a "big chief—great brave," and their awe and reverence for him was still further increased from the fact that he had fired a wagon at them!

A LEGACY.—Jerry Diggs remembered his miserly uncle in his will, for he bequeathed, "to my mother's brother, a pistol-flint and knife to skin it with."

A FACT.—If you were to build schools without playgrounds, nobody would get beyond short division in a lifetime.

THE AMERICAN FLAG.

Reader, if you have ever travelled in foreign lands, perhaps beneath the despotic sway of some European tyrant or his imperious representative, you cannot have failed to notice with what delight your eye greeted the stars and stripes of your own land, as they streamed forth from some consular staff, or were displayed from a vessel in port. Again, with what a thrill of joy have you hailed our flag, when, sailing upon some distant sea you have descried a far-off vessel, and at length made out the beautiful red, white and blue of our country's ensign, as it floated above her. It is the common remark of every American who goes abroad, that no flag whatever looks so handsome as our own. It may be that this estimate of its superior beauty is prompted by a love of country. We would fain hope that it is; and have sometimes tried to convince ourselves that nothing but a feeling of patriotism makes us thus admire the American flag above all others. But it is really very beautiful, and the good taste which first designed it can never be sufficiently commended. The just proportion of the three colors, their admirable and significant arrangement, alike gratify the taste; while the fitness of the design in all its parts, to commend the standard to the skies, strikes the feelings and the judgment at once. Who that contemplates the rosy red that pictures the dawn, the brilliant white that tells of sunlight, the azure blue that emulates the sky, and the clustering stars that signify the heavens, can fail to see that such a flag is fit for the skies, and fit to emblemize our happy, hopeful country?

The flag of the Union, as first displayed at Prospect Hill, in Charlestown, to celebrate the day which gave being to the American army under Washington, in January, 1776, consisted of thirteen stripes, alternately red and white. It was raised under a salute of thirteen guns and with thirteen cheers, and, as Washington said in a letter, written January 4, 1776, the "Union flag" was hoisted "in compliment to the united colonies, on the day which gave being" to the "new army." In 1777, this design was further improved by the addition of the stars, and the national flag thus constituted. As new States were added to the Union in after years, stripe after stripe was added to the flag, until in 1818 it was found that there were already eighteen stripes, and that the beauty of the flag would soon be destroyed if more stripes were added. The gallant Captain Reid, who commanded the privateer General Armstrong, upon being requested by a committee of Congress to suggest suitable alterations in the flag, for the purpose of restoring and perpetuating its beauty, proposed to restrict the stripes to the original number, thirteen, and to adopt one star for each State, adding a star for every new State admitted in the time to come, and forming all the stars into one grand luminary in the centre of the blue field. This plan was adopted by Congress, by act approved April 4th, 1818, which went into effect on the 4th of July following. The flag designed by Captain Reid contained twenty stars, and he is believed to have caused the first flag to be made upon this design, after it was adopted by Congress. As the Union is now constituted, the flag consists of thirteen stripes, emblematical of the original thirteen States, and thirty-two stars grouped together in the form of a single star, emblematical of the present States and of the Union. Before long, four more States will probably be added to the constellation, and yet others in the time to come.

THE WOMEN OF THE REVOLUTION.

Ah, how much we owe them. Their hearts were as heroic as those of the men, and their courage the more commendable, since it was often exhibited unseen. On one occasion during the war of Independence, all the able bodied men in Eastern Massachusetts had been summoned to Rhode Island, to defend Providence and Newport against an anticipated attack of the enemy. It was the planting season, and the year's crop was imperilled by their protracted absence. The pastor of one of the country churches, riding up to a farm house one day, designing to pay a parochial visit, was met at the gate by a sturdy matron, equipped in her husband's breeches, frock and boots, with a hat on her head and a whip in her hand. Not far off stood the oxen yoked to the plough.

"My good woman," said the astonished minister, "what does all this mean?"

"Mean?" she answered, with a stamp of the heel and a crack of the whip, "Lord North says that we shan't plant, but I say we will."

FASTING AND FEASTING.—"Taking the one with the other," said the Rev. Sydney Smith, "I believe my congregation are the most exemplary observers of the religious ordinances; for the poor keep all the fasts and the rich all the feasts."

HEALTH AND REPUTATION.—As they who, for every slight sickness, take physic to repair their health, do rather impair it, so they who for every trifle are eager to vindicate their character, do rather weaken it.

DRAWING IT FINE.

Dr. Wallaston has succeeded in drawing out a solid gold wire so fine that it was only one thirty thousandth of an inch in thickness. This is a much more delicate process than even hair-splitting, and, so far as we are concerned, we have no particular wish to have our gold drawn out so very fine. Nor can we see any particular use to which such a very slender wire could be put, unless, perchance, it might serve for the micrometer of a transit instrument. The process by which the patient doctor succeeded in getting so very small a wire of gold, was by making use of the superior ductility of silver. He took a rod of silver and bored a hole through it, from end to end. Into this hole he inserted the smallest gold wire he could procure. He then subjected the silver rod to the wire-drawing process, by heating it and passing it through holes in a steel plate, successively smaller and smaller, until he had brought it to the finest state attainable. The silver wire was then as fine as a hair, with a minute gold wire in the centre; for the gold never deserts the silver, but follows it through the whole process to the last stage. To get his gold wire out from the inside of the silver, he then eat off the silver coating with warm nitrous acid, leaving a pure gold wire of the minute diameter above stated. This is probably the slenderest wire that the hand of man ever produced; and yet, fine as it is, it is quite thick when compared with the film of gold upon the surface of gold lace, which is estimated to be only one three millionth of an inch in thickness, or one hundred times as thin as the doctor's wire.

EARLY RISING.—There are no hours of the day so invigorating, so propitious to mental exertion as the "wee sma' hours ayont the twal," provided you rise to meet them, and do not sit up to wait for their coming. We speak from experience, we who are at our work long before

"Jocund day Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain tops."

We have no sympathy for the man, who, as the Scotch song says:

"Hae rather gang supperless into his bed,
Than rise in the morning early."

PRIDE.—Pride either finds a desert, or makes one; submission cannot tame its ferocity, nor satiety fill its voracity, and it requires very costly food—its keeper's happiness.

A QUICK DRESSER.—The highest and most valuable of all the female virtues, a virtue that Eve herself was certainly not born with, is to be a quick dresser.

BLACK CAVALRY.

Matthias Corvinus, made king of Hungary by the vote of the whole nation in 1467, organized a formidable body of cavalry known as the Black Legion of Bohemia, the uniform of which was entirely black. This corps was more than a match for the famous Turkish Janissaries, and became the most redoubtable body of troops in Europe. King Matthias was the ablest monarch that Hungary ever possessed, and raised his country to the height of prosperity and power. He was, both in peace and war, the most active and enlightened monarch of his age, keeping Bohemia in subjection, defeating Turks, Austrians and Poles in war, and making Vienna his capital. At Buda he founded the largest public library in Europe, enlarged and improved the university of that place, and made it the seat of literature and learning. In addition to his Black Cavalry, he organized a powerful artillery, then a novel arm in European warfare, which gave great efficiency to his military power. But at his decease, the bright creations of his military genius as well as the civil improvements which he had instituted, faded away; and the next we hear of black troops, is the celebrated corps of Frederick the Great of Prussia, the Black Walloons, in the year 1755.

REMEMBER.—All the serials of the day, magazines, pamphlets, newspapers, music, London Illustrated News, Punch, etc., are bound at this office, at the lowest rates, and returned in one week. Old books rebound, and made as good as new, at a trifling charge. Gather your loose paper-covered works together, and see what choice volumes can be made for ornament and preservation.

A NEAT RETORT.—One of the neatest replies we ever read of, was that of a certain earl marshal who, being found fault with by his sovereign for some misarrangement of a coronation, said: "Please your majesty, I will try and do better next time."

SWEDISH LAW.—In Sweden, a man who is seen four times drunk is deprived of a vote at elections. Hence, as an enormous quantity of spirit is consumed in Sweden, vast numbers of voters are disfranchised.

A CHARITABLE LESSON.—It would be uncharitable too severely to condemn for faults, without taking some thought of the sterling goodness which mingles in and lessens them.

LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Reader, did you ever travel on the mighty Mississippi River, in one of those monster steamers that ply between New Orleans and St. Louis? If so, you have seen a peculiar and striking phase of life—peculiar not only to this country, but to the western section of the Union; for there is nothing like it either in Europe or any other part of the United States. These boats are usually three stories in height, and of vast extent, so as to make their draught of water light, and are capable of carrying two or three thousand persons. The lower deck, which is nearly level with the river, contains the furnaces, boilers, engines, wood for fuel, accommodations for the crew, and vast quantities of freight. The other two decks are appropriated for state rooms and saloons, for the convenience of passengers, the officers' quarters, clerk's office, bar-room, etc.—with the pilot's house overtopping all. The wheel-houses at the sides, covering the paddle wheels, are of monstrous size, and make quite a feature in the outline of the boat; while the two smoke stacks and steam-pipe tower aloft, like grim sentinels keeping watch and ward over the domain of some mighty enchanter. These boats are universally provided with high-pressure engines, owing to their superior lightness when compared with low-pressure engines of the same power. The constant discharge of steam through the escape-pipe, at every stroke of the engines, makes a noise like the firing of heavy cannon, which to the novice is quite startling, but to the ear of the practised traveller is an assurance of safety. For, if the throbbing of the great heart beneath the deck should go on for a single moment without the booming of the escape pipe, an explosion would ensue that would rend the boat in twain, and scatter freight and passengers high in air and far upon the waters.

Among the thousands who cluster upon the decks and in the saloons of one of these great packets, there are representatives of every quality and condition of western life. The wealthy planter, the scheming merchant, the industrious mechanic, the humble emigrant, the sagacious lawyer, the babbling politician, the reverend preacher, the fops and belles of fashion, and the stricken children of poverty and want—all are there, in one promiscuous mass of seething humanity; and there, too, is the gambler in all his phases, from the graceful and accomplished swindler, to the lowest blackleg that plays "old sledge" with smutty cards, or throws a nick with loaded paw-paws. Sometimes you will see a large crowd gathered at one end of the boat, listening to the eloquent sermon or fervid prayer of a popular western divine, while in the middle knots of crafty gamblers are fleecing their excited victims, and at the other end gay parties are enjoying the pleasures of the dance, to the music of an extempore band. Occasionally a group of thirsty souls break off from either of these collections, and make a visit to the gaudily furnished bar, where whiskey is the favorite beverage. It is to an Eastern man a noticeable fact, that though the hard drinkers on these boats make ever so many visits to the bar, yet they seldom become so intoxicated as the same class of persons among us; and the explanation thereof is found, not in the greater weakness of the liquor they imbibe, but in the smaller quantity they take. But a Yankee always wants his money's worth, even though it be liquid damnation.

Occasionally the attention of the passengers is withdrawn from their favorite pursuits, to witness the scene when the steamer stops at a landing to "wood up," or take freight. This is quite a picturesque affair, particularly at night. The furnace doors are thrown open to afford light for the operation, and the fierce glare of the fires invests the landing, the high river bank, the wood-pile or the bale of cotton, with a mixture of ruddy brightness and deep shade that is perfectly startling to the beholder. Emerging from the surrounding blackness, the negro laborers are seen flitting across the lurid light, on their way to and from the boat, bearing burdens; while the fierce roar of the escaping steam above, and the sullen flash of the dark waters beneath, confound the sense of hearing and lead the observer to imagine that he sees before him the infernal regions of the poet, and beholds the fiends of darkness bearing souls away to the doom of torment. But the merry grin of the darkies and their jocund tones soon dispel the illusion; and anon the wave of the captain's hand causes the crew to hurry on board, the fastenings to be cast off, the furnace doors to be closed, and the pall of silence and of darkness to fall upon the scene. The roar of the steam-pipe ceases, the boat pursues her way upon the river, and the steady booming of the engine proclaims that everything is restored to its wonted state. Thus matters go on, day after day, and night after night—the throng of passengers continually changing, as port after port is reached—some going and others coming—until at length the great city is reached, the grand landing made, and for the time being, life on the Mississippi ends. Is not this a microcosm of life itself, as we scramble through it?

THE VICTORIA BRIDGE AT MONTREAL.

The greatest work of civil engineering upon this continent, and probably the greatest of its kind in the world, is the tubular iron bridge which Mr. Ross is building across the St. Lawrence River, at Montreal. The river is about a mile and a half wide, at this point, and the current is very rapid and powerful. But in the spring of the year, when the ice is breaking up upon the river and in the basin above, the rush of the swollen stream, crowned with thick sheets of solid ice, is perfectly appalling—apparently defying, by its overwhelming momentum, any structure which man could rear upon its path. It was to build a bridge across such a stream as this, that the art of the engineer was put in requisition; and to build it, too, so high above the stream, that the rights of commerce should not be infringed—so high, that smoke-pipe and mast might pass clear beneath it. Stone piers were to be raised on the bed of the river, so solid that the ice-laden waters could not move them, so high that the iron bridge which they upheld could offer no obstruction to passing vessels. Twenty-four of these piers are provided for, at a distance of two hundred and forty feet apart, those in the middle of the river being rather more distant from each other.

Of these solid stone towers, sixteen are already completed. They are composed of massive stones, smoothed and bolted together with great irons where they meet the ice, and their surfaces so sloped, that the crushing mass will glide up the slope, expend its force, and break into fragments. Their foundations are laid deep in the bed of the stream, for which purpose the water is shut out by coffer dams; they rise sixty feet above the usual level of the water, and are ninety feet in length on the sides parallel with the river's course. Each pier contains ten thousand tons of stone, and of course opposes an enormous resistance to the power of the stream. Those which were finished last year, stood the spring freshet without being disturbed, the ice piling to their full height and passing over the top. This test is regarded as highly satisfactory, because when the massive iron bridge is laid upon their tops, their power of resistance will be even greater than now. The bridge is to be a four-sided iron tube, of greater height than width, and made sufficiently strong to bear any weight of locomotive and cars that can be run through it. This tube is made of thick iron plates, duly proportioned in the different parts to resist compression and prevent elongation, and strongly rivetted together. Six sections, of two hundred and forty feet each, will be completed and in place this fall, and a glance at those already finished, is sufficient to satisfy any one of the bridge's capability to bear any weight that will be put upon it.

The sides of the river are cushioned with long causeways of stone and earth, designed to take the force of the ice in the spring, and make its advance more gradual before it touches the piers. These causeways reach far out into the river, and are very broad, with their face sloped in such a manner as to divert the course of the ice. This part of the work is complete; it was of itself an enormous undertaking, involving great labor and expense. The climate is such, that out-door labor can only be performed upon the bridge for six months in a year, from May to November, and consequently very large gangs of men are employed, and all the aid which steam power can give, is pressed into the service. Twelve hundred men are now engaged upon the work, and at the present gratifying rate of progress, it will probably be finished in about two years. When completed, it will be a most imposing specimen of engineering; and as a suspension tubular bridge, it will far surpass the famous Menai Bridge in Wales, and prove an object of picturesque grandeur worthy of a journey of hundreds of miles to behold. It will be known throughout the world as the Victoria Bridge.

CONTEMPT OF RICHES.—There's a man "out West" who says he don't covet riches, by any means, but thinks he would like to be a second "Rothschild" for a few moments, when some one tries to bluff him at poker.

A FUNNY IDEA.—Punch thinks the cable was tarred for the same reason that farmers tar their corn when planting—to prevent the Crows from pulling it up.

A GENTLEMANLY BRIDEGROOM.—The young Queen of Portugal lately asked her husband, at dinner, what wine he preferred. "Port-yougal!" was the reply.

OUT OF DANGER.—There is no fear of William B. Astor's coming to want—so long as his yearly taxes in New York are $85,000.

STREAM FIRE-ENGINES.—These machines are working their way into favor. In Chicago, they have two of them, and talk of getting more.

GENIUS AND VIRTUE.—Genius has limits, virtue has none; and every one pure and good can become purer and better still.

SMALL FEET.

The passion for small feet is rather a common affection for the fair sex in all countries, as well as of those effeminate puppies of the male species, who aspire to the dignity of lady-killers. Feet are tortured for the better part of a lifetime, by these civilized devotees of small feet, who go limping and shuffling about the world in tight shoes or boots, afflicted with corns and cursed with bunions, and catching their breath at every other word they speak, out of sheer anguish at the pain they suffer. The Chinese people are more philosophical than we are, in this respect, for they wisely condense all the pain and suffering from small feet, into the interval of a few years of infancy, and for the rest of life enjoy the delectable distinction of little feet, without the attendant daily torture. The females who are destined to exhibit this aristocratic badge, are taken in early life, when about two years old, and put through a course of torture which lasts for six or seven years; by that time the feet are effectually subjected to the necessary distortion to produce smallness, and for the remainder of life nothing is necessary but to keep them snugly bandaged. Certainly this is an improvement upon our custom of constant torture, and we would respectfully suggest its adoption by fashionable mamas who are anxious to see their daughters excel in the smallness of their feet.

The true "small foot" of a Chinese belle, is an odd-shaped little bunch of flesh and bone, with the instep directly under the leg, where the ankle ought to be, the great toe drawn back to the heel, no small toes visible, and the sole presenting merely the bottom of the heel and great toe, with a deep cicatrice between. The little shoes brought from China as curiosities, are the veritable article used by the Chinese ladies, and no exaggeration got up for show. As the shoe receives only the heel and great toe of the foot, it can readily be seen why the article can be made so small. The first process to produce small feet, is, to bend the four small toes under the foot and confine them there by rigid bandages, the great toe being left free. This produces much inflammation and pain in the child's foot, but the careful mother perseveres, until at length the four toes lose their articulation and identity, and become merged in the sole of the foot. After a few years the second process is applied, which consists in bandaging the foot in such a way as to arch out the instep, and draw the great toe back towards the heel. This is more painful to the child than the first process, and in some cases produces sickness and death.

The ligatures are gradually tightened from time to time, as the bones and tendons yield to the pressure, until at last, in the course of a few years of this prolonged torture, the ball of the natural foot fills up the hollow of the sole, and the root of the great toe is in contact with the heel. The triumph of art is now complete, the inflammation subsides, and the pain ceases. Nothing is necessary but to keep the foot bandaged so as to preserve this form, and the aspiring female has the pleasure of hobbling about for the rest of her life upon her heels and great toes. It is due in candor to mention that there is one drawback to this ornament of small feet, and that is, the appearance of the legs. The process of shaping the feet deadens and wastes the muscles of the lower limbs, so that the calves of the legs are entirely destroyed, and the fashionable Chinese belle is a perfect spindle-shanks. Whether this drawback is a fatal objection to the adoption of the Chinese system of training, by our fashionable mamas, we will not undertake to decide.

KIDD'S WEALTH.

Various have been the excavations made along our coast in the hope of discovering the deposits of Kidd, the pirate's, money, but no one could ever find out exactly where it was buried. Captain Burton, however, the enterprising traveller, who in the disguise of a Moslem penetrated to the Prophet's tomb, contributes to a late number of Blackwood a journal of his travels in East Africa, in which, speaking of Pemba or the "Emerald Isle," off the Eastern coast of Africa, in the Indian Ocean, he says: "In A. D. 1698, the bold buccaneer, Captain Kidd, buried there his blood-stained hoards of precious stones and metal, the plunder of India and the further Orient. The people of Pemba have found pots full of gold lumps, probably moulded for buttons that the pirate might wear his wealth."

SAVE FOR BINDING.—Save the numbers of "Ballou's Dollar Monthly" for binding. At the close of each year you will thus have two finely illustrated original volumes of six hundred pages each, all for one dollar a year! We can still supply the numbers complete from the first of the year.

A CATASTROPHE.—The lady who made a dash has since brought her husband to a full stop.

FIVE CENTS.—The price of Ballou's Pictorial is Five Cents per copy, everywhere.

Foreign Miscellany.

The British census foots up 16,763 lawyers, 18,728 doctors, and about 21,000 clergymen.

The expenses of the British Patent Office, this year, have been considerably over its receipt.

The emperor of Japan is waking up. He is going to establish a line of electric telegraphs.

American life-boats are the only ones now used on the English coasts—all others have failed.

The prospectus of the Indian and Australian Telegraph Company, with a capital of $2,500,000, has been issued.

The writings of Schiller, translated into Russian, by the poet Gerbel, are publishing at St. Petersburg.

A Belgian who drank seven pints of gin upon a wager in England, felt somewhat unpleasantly after performing his task, and soon died.

Belgium, with a population of about 4,500,000, has a National Guard amounting to 190,907, and a regular army between 40,000 and 50,000 strong.

Queen Victoria lately conferred the Victoria Cross upon a number of her soldiers of all ranks, it being the third bestowal of this great order of valor.

Judaism is advancing in Prussia. A decision of the minister of justice there has conferred for the first time on a Jew the functions of notary and advocate.

Nearly twenty-five thousand gold and over eighty-three thousand silver watch cases were marked at the Assay Office in London, during the year ending in April last.

The London papers state that the Bank of England has purchased the great Australian gold nugget, which has been exhibited at the Crystal Palace, for £5905.

Professor Morse has been decorated by the Emperor of France with the insignia of the Legion of Honor. He was decorated with a legion of honors before.

The New Testament is about to be published in the Court dialect of China, in one octavo volume of about 150 leaves, at a cost of from 12 to 15 cents a copy.

The University of Jena has just celebrated its 300th birthday. Great preparations were made, and all the wit and learning of Germany was attracted there.

There are in London one hundred and fifty ragged schools, attended by twenty thousand children, who are instructed by about two thousand voluntary teachers.

A London printer by the death of a relative in Calcutta whom he had never seen, recently came into possession of a million and a half pounds sterling. Nice little sum for pocket money of a holiday.

In boring an Artesian well at Bourn, Lincolnshire, England, a spring was struck which throws the water twenty-three feet above the earth's surface at the rate of three hundred and sixty-five gallons per minute, or 191,844,000 in twelve months. It has only one equal, and that is in Paris.

Mohammed Pacha writes to Washington that he had a great time while he was in this country.

Two officers of the French army have been tried and convicted, recently, of swindling.

The Republic of San Marino, in Italy, has awarded a medal to Miss Maria Mitchell, the astronomer of Nantucket.

The total gold circulation of Great Britain is estimated at $250,000,000, and of paper money $158,000,000.

Napoleon is marrying off his marshals as fast as he can. No matter how old or fat they are, Eugenie finds brides and Louis fortunes.

The African squadron is the healthiest of all our fleets, with the exception of the Brazil. This is owing to the unusual care taken to preserve the health of the officers and men while on that station.

There is great repugnance in Australia to the Chinese emigrants, and the colonial assembly has passed a bill taxing them ten pounds per head. The miners are not satisfied with this, but demand their exclusion from the country.

Telegraphing is now looked on as an art of material consequence on the continent. The Prussian minister of commerce has just founded a school for forming clerks for the electric telegraph office.

In England, the Lord High Chancellor receives £10,000 a year; the Lords Justices of Appeal, £6000 each; the Master of the Rolls, £6000; and the three Vice Chancellors, £5000 each.

The park surrounding the palace of the Duke of Devonshire, in England, is eleven miles in circumference, and contains three thousand acres. The conservatory, which is filled with every variety of tropical plants, covers an acre of ground, is 100 feet high, of oval shape, and cost £100,000.

A builder in England has patented a method of fixing a window upon an axis in such a manner that, on its being made to perform a semi-revolution, it will present to the inside of the room the side which was previously outside—a method which affords great facility for cleaning and repairing.

Russia is supplying herself with manufactured iron from France. At Havre, lately, six locomotives and tenders were shipped for St. Petersburg. They are consigned to the Russian Railway Company. These are the first six of forty which are being made by four of the principal French firms.

A company has been formed to manage the Lyrical Theatre of Rio Janeiro, with a capital of 180,000 francs as a guarantee for the salaries of the performers. The Emperor of Brazil has granted an annual subvention of 33,000 francs for three years, to be taken from the profits of the public lottery.

It is stated that in the quarter ending March last, 60,068 persons were married in England and Wales, being 6700 fewer than the number who married in each of the winter quarters of the two preceding years, an unmistakable evidence of the depression of business during the last winter.

Record of the Times.

The estimated value of the public parks and squares in New York city is $8,986,000.

The militia force of Massachusetts, all told, now amounts to 6737 persons.

At twenty-one years of age, Archbishop Hughes was a working gardener.

Gold ore, of a very valuable quality, has been discovered in Franklin County, Va.

America, says an exchange, should have been called Colonia, from the Italian of Columbus.

There are about four millions of children and youth in the various schools of the United States, and about 115,000 teachers.

The journey from Louisville, Ky., to Washington, in 1824, was performed in fourteen days. It is now made in thirty-six hours.

The whole value of the property owned or used by the M. E. Church, south, for educational purposes, including libraries, apparatus and buildings, is not far from $200,000.

It was a prime joke of Canning's, who, when told by an eminent doctor that poverty was a virtue, remarked that he had never known what making a virtue of necessity meant till then.

A rogue down South stole a lot of newspaper accounts, and upon being discovered, was sentenced to eat all which could not be collected as desperate debts. Guess he would have a full stomach, for once.

A pert young lawyer once boasted to an old member of the bar, that he once received two hundred dollars for speaking in a certain cause. "I received double that sum for holding my tongue," was the reply.

According to the Arkansas State census for 1858, the population of that State is 318,313, as follows: White males, 136,943; white females, 120,640; free colored, 682; slaves, 60,048. Total, 318,313.

The receipts of cotton at Galveston, Texas, for the year just closed exhibit an increase of 41,938 bales; the amount for 1857 having been only 71,399; while for the year just closed it has been 119,827.

The Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad has only forty-six miles to complete, to make a direct and continuous railroad connection, under one management and control, from Philadelphia to Chicago, and requiring only a single change of cars in eight hundred miles.

Over five hundred tons of white paper, worth from two to three hundred dollars per ton, forty tons of tar-paper for back covers, twenty thousand sheep and goat skins, and over half a million leaves of gold, are annually consumed in the Bible manufactory of Jasper Harding & Son, Philadelphia.

The efforts of the ladies of America to purchase Mount Vernon and the tomb of Washington, are being attended with exhilarating success. New York bids fair, so far, to surpass all the other States of the Union in the liberality of its private subscriptions to accomplish this noble work.

A young lady was lately killed by lightning in Janesville, while a child in her arms was unhurt.

Do not go to the utmost limit of even lawful pleasure. Good and evil join.

The fellow who shot Time on the wing, has renewed his age.

There comes forever something between us and what we deem our happiness.

Heaven sends good figures. It is woman's enemy who would tempt her to wear crinoline.

Our greatest glory is not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.

The young gentleman who flew into a passion has had his wings clipped, and we told.

A virtuous mind in a fair body is like a fine picture placed in a good light.

The population of Texas, by the new census, will be about four hundred and fifty thousand.

The western papers contain very contradictory accounts about the South Platte gold diggings.

The pearls recently found in Kansas are net worth more than five dollars a peck.

The liberal party in Mexico has been buying U. S. rifles, in an argumentative mood.

The best remedy in the world for low spirits is to have a clear conscience and a warm heart.

The cranberry crop of Massachusetts proved much lighter than usual this year.

A strong dose of camphor, says one, is an antidote to the poison of strychnine.

Gerrit Smith has made a donation of $500 to the Alfred Academy, located in Alleghany county.

The total amount of alms distributed in the United States in the year 1857 by the Catholic Society of the Propagation of Faith, was $90,285.

It is estimated that the number of messages which annually pass over the American telegraph lines, is, in round numbers, four millions, yielding a net revenue of $6,000,000.

Nearly four hundred and fifty thousand tons of pig iron were produced in Pennsylvania last year. Of manufactured iron, there were 227,837 tons.

Brigham Young's private mansion, in Salt Lake City, was erected at a cost of $65,000. It is three stories high, and balconied from ground to roof. An observatory on the top of it is surmounted by a bee-hive—the Mormon emblem on the Territorial seal.

A patent has been taken out for an apparatus for raising and lowering the skirts of dresses. This consists in the use of a girdle with cords united at one end in a knot, whilst their other extremities are attached over pulleys to the garment. By drawing them up by hand at the knot, the dress will be raised to the distance required uniformly all round.

A tinsmith named Mudford came near losing his life in Syracuse in a very singular manner. He was standing on a small ladder in a cistern, making repairs, when the gas from the small furnace he was using produced stupefaction, and he fell from the ladder to the bottom of the cistern, cutting his head and face badly, and injuring his back and shoulders.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

Undisguised covetousness—Digestive calm.

Tenderness and gentleness.

Attention, desire, surprise—satisfaction and sleep.

Anger, mixed with fear—anger alone.

Gaiety—Fury and terror.

Death!

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

3 1951 D00 332 002 2

Merry-Making.

The man who was filled with emotion hadn't room for a dinner.

Madame de Stael said that the weak may be joked out of anything.

The individual who was accidentally injured by the discharge of his duty is still very low.

A pawnbroker is like an inebriate; he takes the pledge, but cannot always keep it.

To prevent water on the brain—have the patient's head shingled by a barber.

Why is a handsome woman like bread? Because she is often toasted.

A funny sight is two fashionably-dressed women in a rain storm with only one umbrella.

Why is a discontented man like a watchful house dog? Because he's a growler.

We saw five mortal columns in an English newspaper, headed "just one word."

A beehive is like a defective potato—one is a bee holder, the other a specked-tater.

A certain benevolent miser (?) used to boil the pudding-cloth and give the broth to the poor.

A philosopher resembles a cucumber—when most cut up he is perfectly cool.

Wanted—a short clab broken off the square root.

The individual who was "up to snuff," has come down to tobacco.

Which five letters may form a sentence expressive of forgiveness? I X Q S U.

Why is a retired carpenter like a lecturer? Because he is an ex-planer.

Why is love like a duck's leg? Because it is often hid in the breast.

A fat candidate for office in Alabama, who is said to weigh three hundred and seventy-five pounds, asks the people of the district to try him.

Somebody says that General Scott undergoes a metamorphosis every morning. When he first rises, he is Gen. jes' up.

In spite of the exhortations of all the feminine orators, all women are more or less addicted to their glass.

A fellow who chopped off his hand, the other day, while cutting wood, sent to an apothecary for a remedy for "chopped hands."

Some regard must be had for the fitness of things. Either the ladies' dresses must contract, or carriages, church-pews, and sidewalks must expand.

"Did I hurt you?" asked a lady the other day, when she trod on a man's foot. "No, madam, I thank you, seeing it is you. If it were anybody else I'd holler murder."

It is now fully ascertained that the man who ate the apple of discord and picked the bone of contention is the identical individual who was a passenger on board the train of circumstances.

An editor in New Hampshire offers to bet his head against a sixpence upon some political question. A brother editor accepts the bet, says he thinks it an even one, and asks who shall hold the stakes.

To threaten a Yankee with stopping his pork and beans, is the mightiest of menaces.

The last new wrinkle is "cable punch," for sale at the down town saloons.

When does a gardener deserve hanging? When he plots trees on (treason)!

Foots expressed the belief that a certain miser would take the beam out of his own eye, if he knew he could sell the timber.

"Mrs. Dobson, where's your husband?"—"He's dying, marm, and I don't wish anybody to disturb him." Considerate woman, that.

Why are potatoes and wheat like the idols of old? Because they have eyes and see not, ears have they and hear not.

The discovery has been made that without a meuth a man could neither eat, drink, talk, kiss the girls, nor chew tobacco.

A chap down East has invented a machine to make pumpkin pies. It is driven by the force of circumstances.

"You have a very striking countenance," as the donkey said to the elephant when he hit him over the back with his trunk.

It is not insulting to call a man a "son of a gun." It shows him descended from a good stock.

A man introduced to a bride at her wedding, wished her "many returns of the same happy occasion."

"How," said Mr. M. to Mr. Y., "do you accomplish so much in so short a time? Have you any particular plan?" "I have. When I have anything to do I go and do it."

In the committee on the factory bill, a witness from Dundee was asked, "When do your girls marry?" He replied, "Whenever they can meet with a husband."

A chap was asked what kind of a "gal" he preferred for a wife. He replied: "One that was not a prodi gal, but a tru gal and a true gal, and one that suited his conjugal taste."

The facetious Mr. Bearcroft told his friend, Mr. Vansittart, "Your name is such a long one, I shall drop the sittart, and call you Van for the future." "With all my heart," said he; "by the same rule, I shall drop croft, and call you Beur."

"What do you mean, you little rascal?" exclaimed an individual to an impudent youth that had seized him by the nose upon the street. "O, nothing, only I am going to seek my fortune, and father told me to be sure to seize hold of the first thing that turned up!"

"How dreadful that cigar smells!" exclaimed one companion to another; "why, it's an awful smelling thing!" "O, no, it's not the cigar that smells," was the reply. "What is it, then?" "Why, it's your nose that smells, of course; that's what noses were made for."

GIVEN AWAY.

Any person desiring to see a copy of BALLOU'S PHOTOGRAPH, the favorite illustrated weekly journal, has only to address us a line to that effect, and a copy will be sent by return of mail, full of elegant engravings, free of charge. M. M. BALLOU, Boston, Mass.

PICTURES FROM OUR MUSEUM.

BY OUR CAT-EGORICAL EDITOR.

Sleep.

Waking up.

Philosophical reflection, astonishment and admiration.

Contemplation.

Satisfaction, and bad humor.

Hypocritical covetousness.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

Undisguised covetousness—Digestive calm.

Tenderness and gentleness.

Attention, desire, surprise—satisfaction and sleep.

Anger, mixed with fear—anger alone.

Gayety—Fury and terror.

Death!

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

3 1951 D00 332 002 2

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

3 1951 D00 332 002 2

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

3 1951 D00 332 002 2

